

1416
Biography

E14344

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY:

OR,

THE LIFE OF AN ACTOR AND MANAGER.

INTERSPERSED WITH SKETCHES, ANECDOTES, AND OPINIONS OF THE PROFESSIONAL MERITS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED ACTORS AND AUTHORITIES OF OUR DAY.

BY

FRANCIS COURTNEY WEMYSS.

---

"Vanitas vanitatis, et omnia vanitas!"

GLASGOW:
PUBLISHED BY R. GRIFFIN & Co.

---

MDCCCLVII.

PREFACE.

HAVING been frequently asked to commit to paper the varied scenes of an Actor's Life, in which I have been engaged, I have commenced, partly from memoranda made at various periods, the present journal. If any amusement may be derived from such a source, reader, it is at your service; but should the frequent occurrence of the personal I, disgust you, lay down the book. If you travel through it—spare its faults—under the assurance of its veracity. Wherever a change of opinion has taken place it is faithfully chronicled, without reference to the first impression, which remains as it first struck the author, thus endeavouring to do full justice to my professional brethren.

THE AUTHOR.

LIFE OF AN ACTOR AND MANAGER.

CHAPTER I.

Birth. Parentage. Education. High School of Edinburgh. Early Pursuits. Private Theatricals. First Appearance in Public. Strolling Actors. Wise Reflections. Theory versus Practice.

THUS to commence, then. Know all men, that I, Francis Courtney Wemyss, late Manager of the Chestnut Street Theatre, Walnut Street Theatre, Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia; Holiday Street and Front Street Theatres, Baltimore; Pittsburgh Theatre, et cetera, et cetera, first drew the breath of life in Finch Lane, Cornhill, London, on the 13th of May, 1797. My father was an officer in the British Navy, descended from one of the proudest of the proud families of North Britain, who lost his life in the service of his country, and lies buried in the Island of Malta. My mother was born in Boston, Massachusetts, while that State was a colony of Great Britain. Of my boyhood, I can say but little, more than, that I was for a short period on board the Utrecht, with my father, who intended that I should follow his own profession. After his death, I was placed under the care of his brother, Otho H. Wemyss, Esq., Advocate, Edinburgh, was sent to the High School, where I remained three years under the tuition of Mr. Carson, the present Rector of the far-famed school. While there, Dr. Addams, who had for fifty years presided as Rector, died, and was honoured by the Lord Provost and Bailies of the city, with a public funeral, of which the boys, to the number of seven hundred, formed one of the most interesting parts of the procession. He is well known to the literary world as the author of Roman Antiquities, a Latin Dictionary, and a Latin and English Grammar on a superior principle, including all the best rules of Budman, and many valuable literary works. No praise from a pen can add the smallest lustre to a name which will ever be held dear while science and learning deserve a niche in the temple of fame. I was succeeded in my Rectorship by a Mr. Pillans, a very learned gentleman, whose English pronunciation of Latin words was nearly a revolution in the School, which Mr. Taws insisted in enforcing obedience, to the small annoyance of the refractory boys' fingers.

My first bias my mind received towards the stage was thus early given. In acting the part of Lady Randolph, in the comedy of Douglas, at the house of a schoolfellow, Mr. Miller, in 1781, I received much undeserved approbation. Private Theatricals are, at the best, indiduous, and have a dangerous tendency in any young mind imbued with the idea of the possibility of ever becoming an actor, the applause I received on this occasion acted on my imagination at a later period in life, and which nothing could extinguish.

After going through the usual number of Latin words, being rather an apt scholar, bearing in mind the public examinations, I was one morning in my uncle's study, and a communication laid before me from Mr. Thomas Courtney, jun., my mother's brother, bringing me charge of my future welfare if I should think proper to change my views in life, (having been up to this time intended for a surgeon in the navy). To this proposition I gave a willing assent, and my whole pursuits were altered: instead of ardently pursuing a liberal profession, I was to be transformed into a plain, plodding man of business. Messrs. Courtney and Sons, having introduced into Scotland the manufacture of duck, since dignified by the name of linen drilling, established a house in Dundee, where my junior partner was to reside, and to whose care my future destiny was now entrusted.

Never did boy enter upon life with brighter prospects, nor did boy exert himself more successfully in his outset. My attention and assiduity gained me the entire confidence and approbation of my uncle, and at the early age of sixteen, I was entrusted with the superintendence of a business, which in the various departments of flax-dressing, spinning, bleaching, warping, winding, weaving, lapping and packing, employed nearly two-thirds of the manufacturing population of Kirkcaldy, Dysart, East and West Wemyss, Perth, Dundee, Forfar, Arbroath, Brechin, Montrose, and Aberdeen, — all requiring a quota of labour, and all passing for inspection through my hands. My government contract, by the house of Courtney and Sons, requiring the weekly delivery of at least two hundred pieces of cloth, not less than seventy-nine yards each in length, and as much more as could be furnished; nay, at the age of fifteen, I had actually signed policies of insurance and cheques upon the bank, as the authorised agent of Thomas Courtney, jun., when business required his presence in London. What, then, it may well be asked, could induce me to throw away such advantages?

TOO MUCH INDULGENCE AND TOO MUCH MONEY.

My uncle had been for years numbered with the dead; the only fault I can lay to his charge, was much kindness in general, and only one act of harsh severity. Picture a headstrong, high spirited boy of sixteen, placed on a par with men, associating with men, entrusted with business, transacting business with a money at his command, and no control exercised over his actions, the word was to those around him. Thus situated, it is to be wondered at, if stealed in all quarters by temptation, I sometimes exceeded the bounds of prudence. Accustomed to associate with men, I forgot I was a boy, and gambling, the most seductive of vices, became the source of difference between my uncle and myself. Not content with the parties, which, in my company, I was a frequent visitor, I enrolled myself as a member of clubs, frequented of clerks and young tradesmen, who met at my uncle's house twice a week. My visits in these places were communicated with much exaggeration to Mr. Courtney, who, at once, peremptorily forbade me to touch a card except in his presence.

To break up these associations, he signified his intention of taking me with him to London, on a visit to my mother; and little did I think, while busily preparing for this trip of pleasure, it would be the last time I should ever see my dear mother more. She died ten days after my arrival. Thus the loss of my surviving parent turned a visit of enjoyment into one of mournful condolence, and hastened my return to Dundee.

I had a brother two years older than myself, who, from fright, had been labouring under temporary insanity. He was just recovering; and his friends, fearful the shock of his mother's death might occasion a relapse, his uncle invited him to us at Dundee, hoping, by change of scene, to obliterate the traces of recent sorrow. He accepted the invitation, and at the moment of his arrival in Bees' Square, the demon of discord appeared. A coolness, without any apparent cause, placed in Mr. Courtney's treatment towards me: he was reserved; while I have frequently heard him lavish praise upon my brother for work which had been actually performed by me; nor did he ever, owing to my stubborn disposition, become sensible of his mistake, until I had finally left the factory, and William was found incapable of doing what had been previously supposed to be his, but was now discovered to be the labour of Master Frank. Poor fellow, I am accountable for his actions, and I verily believe, would have laid down his life to serve him, of whom I was very much the worst foe. He died at Kirkcaldy shortly after I entered my professional career.

About this time, Mr. Henry Johnston, accompanied by Bartley, James Wallace, then a boy, arrived in Dundee, and announced a medley performance at the theatre, the commencement of the entertainment, a change of place Johnston within the walls of a prison, a suspicion of debt: having suddenly left Ireland, and leave his creditors, who, following him at his heels, surprised him in the North of Scotland. Thus, my acquaintance with the man, who was destined to the career of an embracing stage as a profession, commenced within the walls of the Dundee gaol. Sympathy for a man of talent in distress, induced me to assist him; when, finding his situation almost destitute, I used every effort in my power to alleviate his troubles, furnishing him with every luxury which my uncle's house could afford, frequently spending my evenings in his society, until I derived from his conversation a romantic veneration for the drama, and my humblest professor, ending in my attempt to establish a private theatre in Market Square, in which I acted once a fortnight before all the fashionable of Dundee. Here it was, I acquired a reputation among my companions for dramatic talent, which fixed me upon which I was in hazard all.

Mr. Johnston having been released from prison under the act of "cessio honorum," became manager of a company of comedians in Paisley, afterwards obtaining the Minto and Aberdeen Theatre. In the latter cities I visited him by invitation, to be present at the first masquerade ever given so far north in the land of steady habits. The fortnight I remained in Aberdeen was spent chiefly in the society of the officers of the 42d Highlanders, then stationed there, whom I had known in Dundee: poor fellows, how many of them shortly afterwards found a bloody, but a glorious grave at Waterloo.

On my return home, a crisis approached little dreamt of, and which, in the space of a few short hours, changed my future position in society. I had been engaged during the day, superintending and stowing in the warehouse, a cargo of High T. R. flax, which had arrived from London. The subscription assembly was to take place at the Town Hall in the evening, to which my uncle, my brother, and myself, were going; I was much fatigued, and not being very fond of dancing, would willingly have foregone the ball. My brother William, busily engaged in adorning [ ] person, had neglected to copy a [ ] of some importance to Mr. Willis, of Kirkcaldy, [ ] my uncle, much displeased [ ] the neglect, [ ] to copy, [ ] I told him I was very tired, and that [ ] had [ ] called down. He said rather harshly, "No, sir, do it yourself." This I refused. What followed, I never can forget. He deliberately rose from his seat, reached the letter-book, placed it open on his desk, lighted the candles, placed a chair before the desk, and then addressed me thus—"Young man, I give you five minutes to determine. If you do not begin [ ] copy this letter [ ] the expiration of [ ] time, by the God above [ ] shall see whether you [ ] I am master here, for I begin to doubt it." He [ ] his watch upon the table, and pacing up [ ] down the room, became [ ] more excited. When the time expired, he again asked [ ] if I intended to copy that letter. The monosyllable [ ] was scarcely uttered, when I found myself prostrated by a blow—[ ] made [ ] actor. [ ] took the pen, copied [ ] letter, [ ] the house, with a firm determination [ ] it again. [ ] evening, Mr. Courtney and my brother, the sons of all the mischief, visited the ball, while I paraded the streets, scarcely knowing, from passion and mortification, [ ] I was doing, and caring still less. With my mind in this feverish state, Henry Johnston, and the idea of becoming an actor, first presented itself.

I addressed a letter to [ ] Johnston, telling him I had [ ] leave Dundee for ever, requesting his instruction and support, as I wished to make the stage my profession. In the morning, I informed Mr. Courtney of what I had done.—He laughed at the idea, but finding me seriously bent upon it, he used his utmost endeavour to combat it. As an amusement, he said, he [ ] no objection to it, but to make it the only dependence, whereby to live, he never could consent, adding—"Your own headstrong and ungovernable temper [ ] to a collision, which I most sincerely regret, and could [ ] obliterated from your memory." I replied, "You have degraded me, sir, by a blow, and I feel I never can be comfortable again under your roof; on your return from London, you [ ] not [ ] me here." And thus we parted.

Henry Johnston, in a few days after this interview, passed through the town of Dundee, with his company, on the way to Montrose. He also [ ] me [ ] strenuously to abandon my intention; but finding me fixed in my resolve, promised to aid my views [ ] utmost of his power, as a poor requital for the kindness, he was pleased to say, I had heaped upon him. [ ] was decided I should hold myself [ ] readiness to obey his summons, and he would write to me as early as he could to make arrangements for my reception. At the end of three weeks I received the following letter from him:—

FRANK,

Montrose, July, 1877.

"Suppose you send your Dundee friends for a trial here in Zanga, on Friday next, if you are still bent upon ruin; but remember the hints and predictions of one who has no other motive at heart than your welfare, in return for kindness, when placed in a most unhappy situation. Spencer has agreed to support you as Carlos. Regards to all. Yours sincerely, (Signed,) HENRY SPENCER JOHNSTON."

On receipt of this, I started the following evening for Montrose. I arrived early on Friday morning. I went to Hunter's, Montrose Arms, where I saw a palpitating play, which, to my astonishment, was the Tragedy of Douglas as the play for the ominous Friday. Enquiring of Mr. Johnston the reason of the change, I learnt that Mr. Spencer, who was to have played Carlos, was confined by a fit of gout, and the Revenge was to be played. But, he, "You have played Norval; do it to-night; it will give me an opportunity of judging, and in case of failure, which we will not anticipate, your secret will be confined to your own breast." I, therefore, acted Young Norval, with his name in the play-bill for the part, and this should, in strict justice, be considered my first appearance on a public stage; but no record of it being in existence, I date my theatrical career from my opening in Glasgow, as Selim, in the Tragedy of Barbarossa, two months later. Douglas was thus on the occasion—Young Norval, Wemyss; Glenalvon, Scott; Lord Randolph, Emley; Old Norval, Johnston; Lady Randolph, Mrs. St. Leger; and Anna, Charlotte O'Keefe. Thus was the decisive step taken. I returned to Dundee, with the full understanding that I was to meet Mr. Johnston in Glasgow, on the opening of the theatre there, of which I had the lesson.

On a fine summer morning I crossed the Tay, with the determination of walking to Kinghorn, and so crossing the Frith of Forth to Leith, proceed to Edinburgh; the distance to be accomplished, about thirty-six miles. This, to a young man, who had never walked ten miles at any one time, was a serious undertaking; however, I arrived at the "lenny town" of Kildy, where I made a halt, sleeping at the factory of Messrs. Courtney and Son, there; received five pounds from Mr. Jamieson, their agent, telling him I was on my way to Glasgow, but not divulging my secret of my journey. Crossing to Leith the following morning, I secured a place in the Glasgow mail, from the Bull's Head, in Leith Walk, and resolved to spend the day with my uncle and Aunt Wemyss—the last I ever passed in their company. Mr. Otto Wemyss accompanied me in my coach, little dreaming, God bless me, that I should send me safely to my journey's end, on what errand I was bound. The guard's horn blew, the words "all right" pronounced, and I fairly started. We arrived at Glasgow at two o'clock on Monday morning, when I retired to bed to dream of success, and a prosperous career.

After a hearty breakfast at the Tontine House, I walked to the theatre, where I found the play announced for the opening Hamlet, in which Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kemble were to play Hamlet and Ophelia; H. Johnston, the Ghost; Mrs. St. Leger, the Queen; Emley, Laertes; Berry, (the comedian in Scotland,) Polonius; Spencer, the King. This was the best acted play I had seen. The impression made upon my mind was one of unqualified delight: such language delivered by such artists I had often heard of in London. I was at a distance of twenty-six years, recall almost every action of every player engaged on that night.

My reception by Mr. Johnston was, as Mr. Jarvis says, "the north side of friendly"—coolness scarcely a sufficient name—it was actually rudeness. I went into the manager's room, and introduced me thus—"Well, young man, my name is Johnston. Have you your uncle's consent for this folly?" (He knew I had not, as I had distinctly explained to him my situation at Montrose, when he pledged me to do every thing in his power to advance my interest in the profession I had chosen.) I of course answered, "No." "Then I must suffer you to act until I have your consent." And, without another word, he went out of the room, leaving me perfectly astonished at the change in his behaviour, but his kind and courteous manner when the subject was broached to me, acted thus, although I might have conducted, my judgment, knowing myself a minor, and a runaway boy, might have pronounced me right; but I was at this moment in Glasgow, on his express invitation, with the full knowledge of every thing that transpired between my uncle and myself, and the positive assurance, only of his protection, but assistance. From what has occurred, I may say, with justice, had Mr. Johnston at this time devoted a small portion of his leisure to my instruction, he would have repaid himself handsomely, from my future exertions, and deserved the gratitude of one, to whom he had acknowledged himself under many personal favours. He was the course already mentioned, and converted a warm friend into a bitter enemy.

My situation at the close of this interview was any thing but agreeable. I had left my home, without money, offended friends, depending upon the word of a man who had suddenly apprised ■■■ that I had nothing to hope from ■■■. Thus foiled, prudence should have ■■■ ■■■ return : ■■■ my pride ■■■ wounded, ■■■ fear of ridicule prevented an acknowledgment of error, ■■■ would have immediately reinstated me in the affection of my uncle. I therefore boldly resolved to make an application to a strolling manager, named Moss, well known in the theatrical world, ■■■ ■■■ fame, in ■■■ metropolitan theatre. He was ■■■ ■■■ with ■■■ company ■■■ Falkirk. Thither I proceeded ■■■ canal boat, and waited upon him, dressed for the occasion—when, after ■■■ interview of nearly an hour, ■■■ was agreed I should open on ■■■ following Thursday, ■■■ Young Norval, ■■■ ■■■ the books for a ■■■. Well pleased ■■■ ■■■ arrangement, all present difficulty seemed overcome, and I was already, in my opinion, the future hero of ■■■ company. Here, again, I ■■■ doomed to meet ■■■ bitter mortification. I ■■■ punctual, according ■■■ promise, at the theatre for rehearsal ; but, oh ! “ what is earth to proud ambition ”—this theatre, ■■■ object of my hope, and my desire, ■■■ ■■■ barn, fitted up in the rudest style ; but I consoled myself with the knowledge ■■■ John Kemble ■■■ acted in a barn : therefore, it could be ■■■ disparagement to me, and there was something romantic in the idea of thus entering the profession at the lowest round of the ladder. But when the ■■■ and gentlemen assembled to rehearse, Falstaff's ragged regiment in apparel were princes to them—with the solitary exception of the manager, there was not ■■■ decently-dressed ■■■. As to ■■■ whole coat, ■■■ appeared ■■■ be a luxury totally unknown ; yet, there was ■■■ shabby genteel appearance among them, which spoke of better days, and ■■■ certain strut, by which ■■■ strolling player ■■■ readily ■■■ by the eye of ■■■ professional brother. As each actor was introduced, I could ■■■ repress a smile—but my courage failed : I resolved not to make ■■■ of ■■■ number. Approaching Mr. Moss, I requested a few moment's conversation ; related to him as much of ■■■ history ■■■ was necessary he should know : told him I had decided on returning home, and wished to decline acting altogether. To ■■■ credit ■■■ spoken, although ■■■ ■■■ prospect of ■■■ house, ■■■ approved my resolution, offering to ■■■ ■■■ if necessary, ■■■ putting, ■■■ said, ■■■ praiseworthy intention into practice. This was my second and ■■■ interview ■■■ Moss. Poor fellow, ■■■ is dead ; but this ■■■ act of his would shame many of those who ■■■ continually railing ■■■ the immorality of the stage, yet would not stretch forth ■■■ ■■■ prevent a youth from plunging headlong into such a vortex of vice and dissipation, as they describe le Terminus sat, which, being rendered into plain American, means—“ nuff sed.”

CHAPTER II.

Effects of Badinage. Reflections and Regrets. Stage Fright. Gratitude of a Manager. A Lawyer's Opinion of the Stage as a Profession. Two Letters. — This Picture and on that.

I could believe in the doctrine of predestination, I it my fate become an actor; for I solemnly declare, the moment I placed my foot in the Glasgow mail coach, as it passed through Falkirk, to return home, I had firmly resolved to abandon, my project, and by strenuously devoting myself to business, make all the atonement in power for the loss of time and trouble I my relations. my unfortunate again my well formed resolutions. On my arrival Dundee, the 20th of June, 1814, Courtney entertaining a party of gentlemen at dinner. The officiousness of a servant, in announcing my arrival, produced a requesting my presence in the dining-room. summons I readily obeyed; but no sooner had I opened the door, fairly over the threshold, than one universal of laughter burst from the table, accompanied with expressions like following: "room for Roscius"—"Here comes proud representative of Shakspeare's heroes"—"Right welcome back to Denmark"—"A frog he would a wooing go," &c. &c.

badinage fate. Smarting under the of jests, of which I not but inwardly acknowledge, I replied to question of—"Are you cured of your folly, and determined for future to closely business." "No, sir, I am off again ing." Not another word upon subject; but moment, I used my endeavours to consent to my becoming an actor. Instead of candidly acknowledging myself disgusted I had witnessed, I uttered first untruth ever passed my lips Mr. Courtney, stating my was only for the purpose of obtaining from him a written acknowledgment of his approbation course I was pursuing, without which Mr. Johnston would permit me to act; my mind firmly fixed upon the subject; his refusal would have the effect of driving me the society of first strolling company who would instead commencing my career in a respectable theatre, with every prospect of only adding a monthly allowance of ten pounds sterling, was reduced to five, and finally to three; and I was to have one hour of my friends' society. Thus, my folly and friends, in a moment of hilarity, by an ill-timed jest, led me to the path which interest and duty pointed clearly to be right.

Thus urged, kindness and indulgence got the his judgment. furnished me with the necessary document,

The die being now cast, before I proceed, let me do justice to one memory I revere, and to whom I owe more than parental indulgence. His liberality in withdrawing from me all pecuniary support, but granting me pecuniary aid, with the hope that I should repent my folly, will be so strongly contrasted with the conduct of my family, that, had Mr. Courtney followed their advice, I should, in all probability, have become a vagabond they feared. Many a time my monthly allowance, which arrived punctually at the hour, was the support not only of myself, but others in my situation. Those only who have experienced the life of a strolling player's life, know or feel the joy with which such a windfall as three pounds would be hailed in what is termed a bad town, where, probably, I was in debt, without a penny in their pockets, and none with a supply of their necessities. Through my bounty was enabled to avoid the shifts and shifts of my professional associates, although I have felt, and know too, the bitter of poverty. I can proudly say, in reviewing this part of my career, that no dishonourable act stains its progress, never having quitted a town, as a strolling actor, in which I did not faithfully discharge every claim against me.

The character of Mr. Thomas Courtney, junior, may be summed up: he possessed a soul of honour, a heart all times open to a tale of distress, and a hand ever ready to relieve it; he was the orphan's friend, the poor man's hope, the man's example. To him may be truly applied Shakespeare's language—

"He was a man, take him for all in all, Eyes shall not look upon his like again."

Death closed his career at the early age of twenty eight; but he lives in the recollection of his numerous acts of kindness, and may my children, while they drop a tear to the memory of their father's benefactor, learn to imitate his virtues, and avoid his failings.

With what feelings did I now bid adieu to the town of Dundee for Glasgow—reconciled to my uncle, furnished with a supply of cash, amounting to fifty pounds, and the written approval of my course—to present myself before Mr. Johnston, convinced every difficulty was surmounted. I seemed at a loss to receive Being I had procured my uncle's approbation, in the green the following morning. Here I introduced to Mr. Charles Kemble, who drew anything a flattering picture of the life of an actor, giving an instance of precarious of their engagements, enjoying favour of public in the highest degree; but from caprice of management, excluded at the time London theatres, of which he was one of the brightest ornaments, and strongly recommending me to abandon all thoughts of stage.

was now arranged I make my first appearance as Selim, the play of Barbarossa, which part was by Mr. Johnston on account of my youth. to memory, expecting to receive instructions in the business of the stage he was so capable of imparting; but my astonishment, Mr. Johnston not attend my and only rehearsal.

A awful night, pregnant with my fate, arrived. I entered on my theatrical career on the first night of the Glasgow fair, July 14th, 1814: never shall I forget the sensation I experienced, as I heard the prompter's bell ring to begin play. My mouth became perfectly parched, my tongue refused its office, and, dressed as I was, one word would have prevented my attempt. Stage fright—I will not attempt to describe thee—actors know well what it is; and auditors, who see difficulty in acting, should be placed but before the lamps, in a crowded theatre, to make critics for

William the Conqueror, I was a stumbling to my future throne. Wishing to appear erect, and not to lose an inch of my height, I was carrying my head with precision, when my toe caught in the stage carpet, bringing me to a kneeling position before the mighty Barbarossa, not in graceful my fright, and induced a facetious member of the company to declare, at the end of the performance, I wanted my voice again, it would be found in the folds of the curtain, beyond which not a sound had penetrated. Yet, I was loudly applauded by the audience, perfectly satisfied my reception; so much so, that I ventured to ask Mr. Johnston emolument I was to receive for my Here is my reply.

(over.)

Sir,—It is my opinion you will never make an actor, and the sooner you

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

return home again, the better. When you resume your late respectable situation in society, I shall be proud and happy to renew our late friendship,

"Yours, &c.

(Signed)

HENRY HADDON

Thus repulsed, I had all the promises of support, so liberally made on his part, and so foolishly depended upon on mine. We separated, to meet again in Philadelphia, in the year 1838, when he applied to me for an engagement at the Walnut Street Theatre. Strange events daily occur in this world. Who could have supposed that the Glasgow manager, who so summarily dismissed a boy of seventeen, in 1814, should in 1838, have applied to that boy for permission to act in a Philadelphia theatre, of which he had become the manager, and be refused, for want of talent, having become perfectly superannuated.

Thus repulsed, Mr. Emley, an excellent actor, and my constant companion, advised me to make an application to an old friend of his, a Mr. Neville, who had the management of a itinerant company, then playing in Glasgow. I accordingly addressed a letter to him, and received a most flattering answer, offering me a fair trial, stating he had been introduced to me, by Dr. Horsley, in Dundee, when a member of the Edinburgh company of comedians, under the management of Mr. Henry Siddons, and had a favourable idea of my talent if properly cultivated; requested me to proceed without delay, to Port Glasgow, and all minor points settled between us when we met. On the 24th day of September, 1814, I departed from Glasgow, in the Clyde steamboat, and on the following Monday, played Young Norval, at Port Glasgow. The manager being pleased with the performance, engaged me a member of his company, the same evening, the enormous sum of fifteen shillings, (not quite 3 dollars cents) per week, with a promise of increase, as I should improve, or appear worthy; which promise he faithfully kept. I paid eight shillings per week for board and lodging. But never having, heretofore, known the want of money, I have frequently, in one afternoon, spent double the amount of my weekly stipend; until finding myself in debt, I had no other means of extricating myself, but by pawning my watch and chain, on which I borrowed ten pounds sterling, which I was unable to redeem for as many months. This was a salutary warning, teaching me the necessity of living according to the rules of economy, and may be called my lesson in adversity.

On the 1st of September, my salary was raised to one pound sterling, for studying the words of Captain Absolute, in the Rivals, at six hours notice, and presenting myself before the public, perfect to a man-of-war. I was not aware that I had performed anything like a miracle, until on the following Saturday, a very flattering note informed me of the increase of remuneration, and conveyed to me the thanks of Mr. Neville and his partner Mr. Shaw, for my kindness on the occasion.

The company consisted at this period of Mr. Neville and Shaw, (the managers,) Mr. and Mrs. Ryder, Mr. Mullendar, Mr. Hart, (known as old Joe Hart,) Mr. McCann, Mr. Martin, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Wemyss, Mrs. Mills, Mrs. Shaw, Mrs. Neville, and Mrs. Hart. Many pleasant hours have I passed in the society of the Ryders. To Mrs. Ryder, I am indebted for my first instruction in the business of the stage: to her alone, I attribute the rapid improvement I made during the first six months of my career. When she left the company, my good genius departed with her. The Port Glasgow company occupies a place in my memory, associated with the most unalloyed pleasure I ever experienced in my profession. The managers were most friendly to me; each actor seemed to take pride in affording me every information in his power. In consequence of this attention, I looked upon the life of an actor, as one of uninterrupted felicity. The difficulty I had experienced in enrolling my name among them, adding to my satisfaction at the result.

Thus pleased with myself and with every one around me, I received the following letter from my uncle Courtney. My refusing to listen to the proposal therein contained proved my ascendancy over the stage at that time possessed

(CONT.)

DEAR FRANK,

I have but just returned from Edinburgh, where I found your Uncle and Aunt Wemyss in the greatest mental distress, on account of the loss of life you have thought proper to adopt. Their indignation I am induced to repeat the ones already made, provided you will renounce your present folly, of allowing you the choice of any profession you may name, for the prosecution of which, I will provide you with a suitable maintenance, until you shall be enabled to live by the profits of your occupation. Weigh this well in your mind, and after due consideration, let me know the result of your determination; at all events, write a few lines to your uncle in Edinburgh.

Yours most affectionately,

(Signed) THOS. COURTNEY, JUNR.

Square, Dundee, Sept.,

On the day I received this letter, my first Benefit was to take place.* The play fixed upon was George Barnwell, the afterpiece The Lying Valet. My manager announced in * This produced me, after paying the charges of the manager, the enormous profit of three shillings and sixpence.

George Harwood. Thinking this a good opportunity of conveying to my friends the idea that I was making rapid strides in my new profession, I enclosed a bill of play to each of my uncles—one to Mr. Courtney Dundee, and one to Mr. Wemyss Edinburgh. I scarcely have recorded this circumstance, but my uncle Wemyss alludes to it hereafter in a most bitter manner.

Looking at my past life as I now do, I am astonished that any infatuation (and such I admit a passion for the stage to be) could have induced me to have rejected the offer contained in the above letter, yet such was the case; and had a fortune beyond my hopes been tendered to me at that time, coupled with the positive injunction of never again to appear on the stage, I should have rejected it without the slightest regret: I only wonder is, that Mr. Courtney continued his allowance, urged me by Mr. Wemyss to abandon me my fate, and was reproached by him as encouraging me in my headstrong disobedience.

A few days brought me an answer to both my letters, which were as follows:—

(COPY FROM C. D. WEMYSS.)

“Dublin St., Edinburgh, Sep., 1814.

Your unexpected epistle, so well calculated to call forth all the angry passions on a subject requiring peculiar care and circumspection, now lies before me.

“The infatuation must indeed be irretrievable, that can induce a human being, who was an ordinary share of intellect, voluntarily to prefer the society of the profligate and lowest drags of the community, together with a contempt, penury, and wretched description, and was frequently attended with sterner still more alarming nature, to the countenance and esteem of a circle of friends and relations, and to those habits of industry, which must infallibly have led, in a few years, to a useful, creditable, independent situation in society.

“Such, however, is your resolution, not taken under the impulse of passion, arising from any grievance, real or pretended, or from any distaste to the line of life which your friends had, with your own approbation, destined you, but deliberately taken, and wilfully adhered to, in face of repeated remonstrances, and of offers so generous and liberal, as were never before made to any young man in similar circumstances. Useful experience will teach you, too late, the real value of these advantages thus unaccountably neglected. I say, too late—for you deceive yourself miserably if you imagine you can at any time relinquish your present disgraceful career, and resume your proper sphere in society: your best friends may not always be willing to receive even a returning penitent. Habits of idleness inimical to all manly exertions, will inevitably be formed, while every hour of lost time, by preventing the necessary previous tuition, will infallibly obstruct any attempt to establish you in a more useful, creditable situation in society.

“I am not so presumptuous as to expect to succeed, where others, entitled to equal respect with myself, have already failed; but I feel it an imperative call of duty to make the attempt. Let me then assure you in the most forcible manner, again to peruse Courtenay's letter, offering you the option of any profession you may desire, which shall be prosecuted at his expense. Should you, then, be inclined to avail yourself of this uncommonly generous offer, I shall indeed feel a proud satisfaction in conveying to him your sentiments, procuring a total obliteration of the past, and forwarding your views, as far as consistent with reason and propriety—but this resolution must be immediate. Should you still persist in your present ruinous and disgraceful career, your refusal can add nothing to the poignancy of that distress, which I, in common with all your friends, have felt from your misconduct; but supported by the proud consciousness of having performed my duty to you, from the earliest hour up to the present moment, I shall attempt the painful task of forgetting for ever that such a being exists, as was once the object of my fondest care, and unremitting solicitude, and from whom I had every prospect of much better things. You cannot have forgotten how, in our conversation, I once told you I would rather see you a common housemaid than a player; the one, though unquestionably the lowest, was still a useful member of society; while the other, in my opinion, was something worse than useless. Those opinions would remain unaltered, even if you, by a miracle, should become a perfect paragon, exceeding any thing ever dreamt of, not to say, actually seen or heard, of human excellence, instead of gaining, with a set of miserable strollers, a pittance less than the wages of a common porter, or daily labourer.

"To me it is now perfectly immaterial under what name* you play the fool, or whether your career shall be successful or not; however, the practical bull of enclosing your play-bill might have been spared; but the piece was certainly well chosen. In Barnwell, if I mistake not, there is an affectionate, ill-used uncle, suffering the extreme of misery, from the prodigal habits of an abandoned wicked nephew. If the similarity of circumstances felt by the actor, the character must have been portrayed with much natural effect.

"Having thus put it once more within your power to extricate yourself with honour from the ruinous and disgraceful career in which you have so imprudently embarked, my paper permits me to add three words only—

PAUSE—REFLECT—DECIDE :

and on your decision it rests, whether this shall or shall not be, the last word you ever receive from your justly offended, affectionate uncle,
(Signed) OTTO HAMMER

My letter would probably have had a greater effect, had the language been less strong. I acknowledge nothing could be more felicitous than the hit at my playbill; but to use my uncle's own expression, nothing could be so well calculated to call forth all the angry expressions. Comparing a player to a hangman, and the latter the preference in society,

* My uncle had previously requested that I would not, in my father's memory, by using his name as the author of a book,

Glasgow company were then performing, on the summons of Messrs. Neville and Shaw, to commence in company of Mr. and Mrs. Ryder, my first strolling journey. The next town at which we were to perform, was Irvine: with three shillings and sixpence in my pocket, the proceeds of my benefit, I started on this journey.

Mr. and Mrs. Ryder's family, consisted of three children, two young girls and an infant boy, the last, rather a tax upon travellers, as he carried the whole distance. In order to relieve the lady as much as possible, I volunteered to carry him, and mile, with his father; but before we reached Kiltwinning, I was scarcely able to carry myself. Mrs. Ryder proved the best pedestrian of the party, I have ever gratefully acknowledged the kindness and attention she heaped upon me at my arrival in Irvine, when the blistered soles of my shoes rendered me unable to walk for two or three days. She is dead—but a kinder heart never beat a woman's bosom—yet withal, she possessed a violent temper. Many times her presence averted a storm upon poor Ryder; but on her faults, when she died, he lost, in truth, his better half, for she was a most excellent and thrifty housewife.

Irvine is a very pretty little town, surrounded by a variety of diversified walks. Our theatre was the Town Hall which we had with much taste, and more than commonly the lot of an actor descending from the roof of a royal theatre, to be the manager of a company of strolling players.

Our company was here reinforced, by Mr. Berriman, an Irishman. The Irvine company appeared delighted with our efforts; the pieces were really well acted, and the manager refusing to attempt whatever was deemed beyond the talent of those under his control, selecting such pieces, as he was enabled to present, with every ability. With all the knowledge I subsequently acquired of patented theatres, few, if any out of London, have filled their "dramatic persons" as well as this little company.

Of the good people of Irvine, I, at least, am bound to speak with gratitude, the hall upon my benefit night being literally crammed. As I was fortunate enough, thus, to eclipse all the better actors, it is but fair I should assign the reason. A gentleman of the town had written a trifling drama on the subject of Burns' Tam O'Shanter, which was produced for Ryder's benefit, in which I was cast the part of "Catty Bark." The tuition of Ryder, the witches' scene, in the interior of Alloa Kirk, so well described by the immortal poet, was placed upon the stage, with all the effect which paint, canvas, and dress could give it. The business of the scene was capitally arranged; and with such spirit was it kept up, that when I obtained the tall of Tam's mare, on the middle of the [redacted] of Dun, [redacted] shout of "Well done, Cutty Sark," [redacted] lowered [redacted] descent of the curtain, each night [redacted] performance.

The little urchins in the street would [redacted] [redacted] I passed, with "Well done, Cutty Sark," and when my name [redacted] announced for a benefit, every body was determined [redacted] there; [redacted] overflowing house was the consequence, but Cutty [redacted] had nearly become a professional nickname, of which I was not [redacted] ambitious, although it [redacted] put several pounds sterling in my pocket.

This season was very successful, and I left [redacted] little town, [redacted] regret, [redacted] proceed to Kilmarnock, a brisk manufacturing [redacted] not far distant: Here [redacted] old friend Buley [redacted] his wife, (late [redacted] Fanny [redacted],) joined the company, which [redacted] [redacted]
[redacted] gradually recruiting for the winter [redacted] which was [redacted] [redacted] p[redacted] [redacted] Ayr.

While in Kilmarnock, I received another pleasant ring, at the respectability of my profession, in reply to a request made, [redacted] [redacted] would remember me to [redacted] inquiring friends—here it is— " * * * * *

You request to be remembered to [redacted] friends—who are none—for ever since it was known you had taken to the stage, you have been looked upon as a lost character, and no one thinks it worth their [redacted] mention your name. I fear your Edinburgh friends cut you for life. * * * * *

This only [redacted] to [redacted] [redacted] romantic [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] profession, while the daily encouragement I received, to renewed exertion, was [redacted] [redacted] bestowed [redacted] [redacted] by the managers. Mr. N[redacted] [redacted] pleased [redacted] compliment [redacted] highly on my evident improvement, and his partner, Shaw, took every opportunity to [redacted] [redacted] praise.

He was an original—well known as a singer of merit in Edinburgh, and [redacted] also received [redacted] approbation of a London audience, his boast, that I was a credit to any company, and should be in London in three years, if I [redacted] to pay [redacted] same studious attention to the profession, fell like manna upon my ears, inspiring me to study long parts, with almost inconceivable rapidity. The season at Kilmarnock was brought to an abrupt termination, by a sudden ebullition of passion upon his part. [redacted] had played a concerto admirably upon the violin, between the play and farce, and afterwards sung "Tak your suid cloak about ye;" when, as he left the stage, an auditor, whose soul was not attuned to sweet sounds, took the liberty of saluting him with "a him." The curtain had reached the stage, and Shaw would not even take time to open the stage door, but thrusting his head under the curtain, hissed furiously back again, uttering some of the most blasphemous expressions ever heard by man. The effect produced was a dead silence, followed by an immediate outcry for an apology, which he refused to make, until riot and confusion prevailed to such a height, that, fearful of his personal safety, he suddenly rushed before the curtain, asking if they wished to see his hi—y brains. Fortunately for Shaw, some wag called out "that's too good—a fiddler's brains, where can he find them." This rally turned the feeling of anger into one of laughter and contempt. He escaped the consequence of his folly; but the company was compelled to beat a sudden retreat, not being suffered to play longer than the end of the week. This was a source of mortification to all, and shortly after, caused the separation of the managers. Shaw, I have never seen since.

From Kilmarnock we bent our course to Ayr, where we passed the winter. Here I became a favourite with the public, and for the first time, began to feel myself of some importance to the theatre. I was worked hard, and not very well paid; but the romantic enthusiasm with which I pursued my now favourite occupation, allowed me little time to think of hardships, which were made the food of mirth, rather than complaint. My leisure hours were chiefly spent at Mrs. McCulloch's, whose house I strongly recommend to any of my readers who may visit Ayr, vouching for the goodness of her table, and moderation of her charges. Many a happy hour have I spent under her roof, and many a hearty supper have I enjoyed, in good fellowship, after a trip to Burns' cottage, in the early part of the day, had laid the foundation for an evening of mirth and joviality. I would fain draw a veil over the scenes of dissipation in which I indulged during my four months' residence in Ayr. My society was courted both by high and low, and I was in real danger of becoming a confirmed drunkard. I never knew what it was to retire to bed perfectly sober,—it is true I was not drunk, but the whisky-punch (and excellently well did my lady hostess brew it,) had always made strong innovations on sobriety,—merry is the best term; for a set of merry dogs we were. Lucky is it for me I am able to record I had strength of mind sufficient to shake off an evil and a growing habit, which confirmed me in my future sober resolutions; and as experience, if not too dearly bought, is cheaply purchased, so my frolics in Ayr were attended with ultimate beneficial results. Having once escaped an abyss, which has swallowed up so many actors, I never again ventured to sport on the edge of it. Poor McAlpine, had you but followed my advice and example, you would have been at this moment an ornament to your profession. Poor fellow, he was another victim to the duplicity and hollow friendship of Mr. Henry Johnston. Enjoying the esteem of a numerous circle of friends in Glasgow, possessing the qualities of a convivial companion, in a greater degree than usually falls to the lot of a private individual, being decidedly one of the best comic singers I ever heard—in an evil hour, he was persuaded to make a trial of his powers on the stage: his success was complete, but unfortunately for him, it interfered with the views of the managers, who, after a few nights, the profits of which were his only object, refused him the opportunity of acting even gratuitously. Being a native of the town of Ayr, and the result of his Glasgow performance having reached the ears of Mr. Neville, he started to Glasgow for the purpose of engaging him. He made his first appearance in his native city as Octavian, in the Mountaineers, in which I played Count Violet. He next appeared as Romeo, but such was his anxiety to witness his performance in a character which he never had studied, that he agreed to play Durimel in the Point of Honour. Finding more difficulty than he anticipated, in committing the play to memory, and that he had overtaken himself, he foolishly neglected it altogether, passed the preceding night in dissipation, and recklessly refused to act the part at all. Public opinion was against him to the highest pitch by his previous excellent performances, so that not a seat was vacant in the boxes. The whole house was full to overflowing, at least half an hour previous to the usual time of commencing. Every argument was used in vain to induce him to appear before the audience and apologise; he steadily refused, but offered to repeat the part of Octavian, if the audience could be reconciled to the change. In this dilemma, Mr. Neville requested me to make an apology to the following effect:

"Ladies and gentlemen,—I am deeply indebted to the managers to you, in consequence of a sudden and unexpected event, it will be utterly impossible for Mr. McAlpine to appear before you in the character of Durimel, as announced this evening. The prompt book of the play having been mislaid or lost, the managers throw upon your indulgence, and request that he be allowed the favour of substituting the play of the Mountaineers, in which Mr. McAlpine will support the part of Octavian."

My apology, first I had been called upon to utter, was well received by the audience, until a young man in the pit, who had provided himself with a book of the Point of Honour, read it to the managers. A deputation with the book was sent behind the scenes, but Neville, like a good general, had secured a retreat, and was nowhere to be found, well knowing the utter impossibility of performing the play.

Foiled, however, in the attempt to see the manager, the opinion quickly gained ground that the manager was Mr. M'Alpine's attempting the part, so that when the curtain rose on the scene of the Mountaineers, Emley myself discovered Kilmallock and Count Violet, we saluted with cries of—"Off!" "off!" "Point of Honour or no play!"—"M'Alpine." We continued to speak for some time without the possibility of being heard, until the top of one of the benches, hurled with violence on the stage, made us both depart in double quick time.

The stage once vacated, the uproar continued, while cries for the manager became so loud and long, that Neville made appearance in company with M'Alpine, entering into an explanation, very wide of the truth, (a practice too common when a dissatisfied audience have to be suddenly appeased,) pacifying the audience by a promise on the part of M'Alpine to sing the comic song the Mail Coach after the play of the Mountaineers. This terminated a row, which at one time threatened destruction of the interior of the theatre.

It was the first time I ever saw M'Alpine play. He continued to improve in his profession with astonishing rapidity, and was pronounced by many excellent judges, a young man of great talent, who would shortly arrive at eminence. Alas! that "man" put an enemy into my mouth to steal away my brains." All his bright prospects have been crushed by his own folly, and the conviviality of his temper proved his ruin. The last I heard of him was as the head of a travelling company in Carlisle, near Ulverston, Lancashire; his performance only recalled the recollection of what he had been, and in all probability, he has sunk into an early grave, another victim to intemperance.

It was in the year 1825, that the resolution of providing myself with my own theatrical wardrobe. Having received a present from London of two very fine tunics, I resolved to lay by a certain portion of my weekly receipts to purchase whatever might be necessary for correctly dressing the parts entrusted to me. How well I accomplished my object, those who have ever seen me on the stage are the best judges. It soon acquired for me the reputation of being one of the most attentive actors to costume, and one of the best dressers in the country: this aided me very materially in my future provincial engagements.

I know that actors of the old school have exclaimed loudly against the practice; and that managers have taken unwarrantable liberties with the public, in consequence of many performers choosing to find their own wardrobe, cannot be denied. If an actor now refuses to find his own dresses, he will frequently be compelled to appear in rags and filth; yet the [ ] may be obtained at [ ] slight [ ] on the part of any actor, that [ ] reputation he is [ ] to obtain from [ ] audience [ ] amply [ ] for the attempt. Yet would I endeavour to persuade the public to prevent managers from encroaching too often on their good nature, where actors either will not, or cannot find their own dress, by loudly hiring, not the actor, but the manager, holdly explaining the cause of disapprobation. A few lessons of this description would speedily correct the evil.

Whenever a new piece is advertised with the additional of new scenes and dresses, unless they are new, it is an imposition, which should be treated as such by the spectators. How frequently does a play-bill trumpet forth the pence and labour bestowed upon a new, when in the fourth or fifth year it is in old acquaintance of the audience even touched by the brush of the artist, while the performers, with the exception of two or three principal characters, appear in the old standing dresses, worn nightly; a few pounds judiciously expended, would have rendered the new in appearance, and produced every requisite of parsimony, the theatricals are well supported, not tolerated an instant; and even in the degraded which I have seen reduced, is unjustifiable, and only tends to make bad, worse.

Every line in a play bill [redacted] be strictly true; but in such a [redacted] has the pernicious system of [redacted] been carried, that [redacted] is a [redacted] saying, "that the greatest [redacted] [redacted] would except a newspaper, is a play-bill." The consequence of this frequently disappointing the public, has produced [redacted] apathy towards [redacted] theatre, which it will take years to destroy.

My participation in ■■■■ too frequently ■■■■ by strolling players, occurred the night previous to my departure from Ayr. Harry M'Cann, (Paddy M'Cann—glorious Paddy, who, when engaged to carry a torch in a procession, provoked the laughter of every one connected with the theatre, by declaring to ■■■■ he ■■■■ improving in ■■■■ profession, ■■■■ he ■■■■ acting the light business at the Oubourg every night,) a worthy little fellow, and at this time my constant companion, having failed in his attempt ■■■■ a benefit, and instead of realizing a profit, finding himself indebted four pounds to ■■■■ (not ■■■■ unfrequent ■■■■ on such ■■■■ lions,*) was placed under stoppage of five shillings ■■■■ week.

* Here let me observe, that the public labour under an erroneous impression with regard to actors' benefits. It is usually supposed that actors

I was crippled his finances, he was unable to large a guinea in his lodgings; for all wearing apparel, together with his stock of wigs, stockings, and other properties needful to a low comedian.
 take each evening to the theatre what wanted for that night's performance, provided it did not in bulk the size of a pocket handkerchief, was regularly brought home after the performance. He therefore extracted the most necessary articles, replacing their bulk by small pieces of painted canvas or other useless articles which abound all. These things were deposited in the trunks of his brother actors, who fortunately situated than himself, while the bundle of was regularly deposited at the bottom of the trunk.
 as he applied on the last occasion to place in trunk two wigs and a pair of boots, possession was of great importance to him. I confess I a few qualms of conscience as I my reluctant sent, on receiving pledge of his honour that money faithfully paid, was done my presence two weeks. Never shall I forget the his landlady trunk was opened in her presence see that the things. She was under the impression they abstracted by some one about her house, thinking possible a strolling could have honour enough, after having abstracted piece the only security she thought possessed of. She actually him two guineas, my nothing about matter, as might injure the reputation of her house. This faculties: he der; was a hearty shake of the sun extorted promise to prove kind the next unhappy actor who might be placed in difficulty, we left her, with opinion honesty play much improved, and an which she attended to every company of actors who Ayr for many years afterwards.

The [redacted] [redacted] Ayr having terminated, Neville and Shaw dissolved their partnership, [redacted] retaining the [redacted] ment. Shaw leaving [redacted] [redacted] taking [redacted] him [redacted] play gratuitously for each other on these occasions. On the contrary, the expenses are fixed at a certain sum by the manager, which, if not received at the doors, the unfortunate actor is placed under stoppages until the deficiency is paid into the treasury: although in many instances, if it had not been for the exertions of the actor whose name is put at the head of the play bills, the manager would not probably have received half of the amount taken on the occasion without including the deficiency which the actor has to make good.

Shaw, and my sister, Miss Mills, and my sister, Mrs. Ryder, my family, and us, and my management on their account, at Port Glasgow; a speculation in which they strongly urged me to embark as a partner. In short, this may be termed the breaking up of our snug and happy party. In a short time afterwards, we were scattered in all directions, many of us never to meet again.

Neville's first effort on his own account was at Mauchline, where he decidedly failed, our force being inefficient. He was advised to try his fortune for a few nights, at Outhrine Mills, a large manufacturing village, but a few miles distant. Having obtained permission from the resident proprietor, Mr. Buchanan, to perform twelve nights, a barn was fitted up for my purpose; and here it was, I for the first time, placed myself among the barn-door fowl of the profession, without my strolling adventures would have been incomplete. I began for the four nights a very excellent; after which, I could scarcely muster money enough to pay my candles. With some difficulty, the manager prevailed upon the actors; and for other debts, I doubt much whether they were paid to my hear.

To our visit to Glasgow was marked by an incident. It was here for the first time I was hissed—the part, Fairweather, Raising the Wind. I suppose I spoiled it, but it was the admirable acting of Emley, in Jeremy Diddler, which caused the offence. He made me laugh so heartily at my breakfast table, that I could not speak for laughing, until my audience tried to change my mind. I went on the stage laughing, while the audience were hissing. I returned the next night: I ran out of the (theatre) barn, home. How the audience laughed, I exactly heard. I gave a long lecture from the manager the following morning, upon the folly of my course, concluding with a very thought a remarkable expression, but which experience has taught me was correct, that an actor, however high his station, must pass through his career, without at any period countering the displeasure of an audience; that I must make my mind such as to remain upon the stage, that nothing but my inexperience prevented my discharging my forthwith.

McCann and myself lodged in the same house, and most comfortable quarters we had, passing a pleasant fortnight, notwithstanding the business. Not on the 15th his troubles were beginning, as we thought our ending. Being in arrears for rent, his goods and chattels were taken "in transitu," as a lawyer would express himself. He had taken no measures, and with such secrecy, that he only secured the scenery, wardrobe, dresses and properties of the manager, but the trunks containing the wearing apparel of the actors, and whatever little private property they possessed—all was in possession of the Philistines.

Unconscious of what happened, M'Cann, Emley, Mrs. Emley, the children, and myself, were on our road to Cumnock, as merry as larks, little dreaming of the mishap which was shortly to overtake us, only thinking what sort of a house we should open to on the following evening, and of our overflowing with money, but all in high spirits. We reached our destination, ordered dinner, which, while we were in the act of enjoying, Neville presented himself, with a face full of sorrow, to recount the sad tale of our undoing. To me it was of awful import. Every thing I possessed, except my trunk, in which I was seated, appeared lost, without the possibility of recovery. The actors, like other human beings, are most merry when they have most to fear for their purses, which passed by wholesale, elevated my spirits, and my first expressions of regret past, I never spent a more pleasant evening.

A council of war was assembled, when the ladies retired, and the course we proposed to pursue being marked out and determined upon, matters were left to take their chance, and not permitted to interrupt our hilarity. My knowledge of business was to be turned to account. Being unable to talk sensibly of warp and weft, winding, heckling, spinning, bleaching, &c., I resolved to wait upon Mr. Buchanan, inform him who I was, and trust to his generosity to release us all from our present dilemma. I started early in the morning for the mills, procured an interview with the foreman, Mr. B. being unfortunately absent. After a well told tale, I succeeded in releasing all the things, promising in the name of Mr. Neville, that the landlord should be paid out of our first receipts, and returned in triumph to my companions, bringing the captured ammunition into port, free from all charge for conveyance to Cumnock. This very act, so adroitly managed on my part, caused my separation from Neville. Once in possession of the scenery, &c., he did not feel disposed to comply with the terms on which they had been released. On this I peremptorily insisted, and went so far as to threaten I would return to Catharine Mills and inform Mr. Buchanan of the breach of faith contemplated. I carried my point, obtaining the money, but I lost my situation, and shortly after bade adieu to Scotland, which I have never visited since.

It was in Cumnock I heard of the death of poor Barry, one of my first theatrical acquaintance, once the idol of the Edinburgh audiences, and, beyond doubt, the best low comedian of his day. Liston, Mathe, and Emery,

bined, would not have been a better man than Jack Berry; his dissipation and repeated loss of neglect his profession, through dissipation, at length was his kindness and patience of Mr. Henry Siddons, that he was reluctantly compelled to abandon him; and, in leaving the Edinburgh theatre, the last restraint upon his unhappy falling, he lost in Dumbarton, where he and his wife had been giving an entertainment of a theatrical nature. He was of intoxication against a glass door, lacerating arm in a dreadful manner to produce lockjaw, which, by the care and attention of his physician, was covered, but was never the same again. He was a member of a travelling company, performing in the air, fairs: and thus the man whose talents delighted an enlightened audience in the British empire, was verted into the low halloo of a mountebank's caravan. He led in abject misery, almost shamed by his pot-house companions. Let his example be a warning to others, who while they breathe a sigh of regret of lost talent, are that dangerous of all seductions to an actor—convivial ings, and free and easy societies—where your valued only by the song you are able to sing, and ing anecdote you are expected to relate—where many court your society within the walls of a tavern, who acknowledge an actor's salute in the open day, in the highway. To all such be your motto—

Veni me impune laceret.

CHAPTER IV.

Parting of old friends. Grave of Burns. Greens Green. Alswick.
 Acquaintance. Journey to Newcastle. Harrogate Springs. Mr. and Mrs. Renss, (late Powell,) Theatre Royal, York. Captivity of Bonaparte.
 Canterbury and Rochester.

THE separation from Neville being finally determined upon, I the landlord Mauchline paid in full, and passed to pay a farewell visit to my numerous friends in Ayr; having once tasted the good cheer of Mrs. McCulloch's table, I towards England, resolved if possible, to procure a situation in Mrs. Butler's company, then performing at Kendal, Westmoreland, or, failing there, to proceed Newcastle on Tyne, and offer services to Mr. Macraedy, for any sum he might think proper to offer; hoping, under excellent tuition, to rise rapidly in the profession. Fall of these resolutions, I arrived in Cumnock, where I booked my name for an outside seat in the coach for Carlisle, which was to start the following day—the last evening I spent in the society of those who remained of my first theatrical companions, with whom I expected to have passed a much longer period of my life. It was a merry and a sad parting. I was carried me the good of the whole nity, I know I parted them regret. Emley and M'Cann were the only two I was ever destined to meet again. With the latter I corresponded regularly, until within months of his death; previous to which I sight him, and have learned he was confined in the King's Bench Prison debt. pride prevented him making situation. If I could not have paid my debts, I could, least, have administered to his wants, and would willingly have shared the last guinea in my possession with him. We have stood, shoulder to shoulder, in many a scrape, and a braver little fellow never left the land of St. Patrick. —Peace be to his ashes.

The ceremony of shaking hands—and, in this instance, hearts went with them—being over, I received and exchanged several small presents, as tokens of remembrance, mounted the coach-box with the driver, and, as the guard gave the signal for departure, waved a last adieu to the assembled company. My reflections, for the first ten miles, were by no means pleasant. Old associations had rendered the Port Glasgow company dear to my feelings. The kindness I experienced from one and all, the ready manner in which many of them had instructed me in the profession, were all presented to my memory; and, in justice, I must add, I never met a company of players so totally devoid of those little feelings of envy and jealousy which frequently render of actors unpleasant, destroying the harmony which ought to exist, where people, from their avocation, are compelled to pass a greater portion of their time in each other's society.

I arrived at Dumfries about 12 o'clock, where I slept; and, early in the morning, visited the grave of Burns. Having passed many a joyful hour in the cottage where he was born, I could not lose the opportunity of viewing his last resting place on earth. At six o'clock in the morning, I again mounted the coach-box and proceeded rapidly to that spot in English history, Arctur's Green, "where runaway couples cross the boundary of their native kingdom to visit a Scotch blacksmith, whose fetters having been tightly rivetted, most them wish in vain to univet again, before the twelve months." place of course, an object of curiosity to most of the passengers, and the driver indulged us with five minutes' delay; after which we proceeded at a sharp pace ■■■■ inn, where we changed horses, ■■■■ is the last possessing ■■■■ leaving Scotland.

After an absence of ■■■■ years, I entered England, ■■■■ metamorphosed. When I departed, ■■■■ a boy, with spirits full ■■■■ youthful hope, ■■■■ the roof of my uncle in Edinburgh, ■■■■ prospects in life were of the brightest nature. My ■■■■ actions had altered the position of affairs. I was now out of employment, travelling only upon the chance of finding an engagement. The beautiful town of Alnwick, the first stopping-place upon my route, awakened a train of feeling, which forced me to acknowledge, I had embarked in a Quixotic expedition, which would, in all probability, plunge me into the depth of wretchedness before I could expect to reap the slightest remuneration, beyond a mere subsistence. My thoughts reverted to Dundee, and to those friends whose offers had been so repeatedly rejected, and I wished, from the bottom of my heart, I had never deserted my home. In this state of mind I reached Carlisle, where I had to remain nearly a day, and where I replenished my exchequer by the sale of my watch-chain, bade adieu to melancholy recollections, and started onward in the mail for ■■■■, passing through Shap, and over the mountains of Westmoreland, to Kendal, at which place I arrived at two o'clock on the morning of the 18th of April, 1815.

At the Crown Inn I enjoyed an excellent night's rest, and breakfast over, my first inquiry of Mr. Riggs, the worthy landlord, was whether the company of comedians had left the place. To my great joy, he answered in the negative, immediately furnishing me with a play-bill, for the following evening. It announced, The School of Reform, and We Fly by Night, for the benefit of Mr. Meadows (now of Covent-Garden Theatre.) I waited upon Mrs. Butler, stating my views and wishes, when she informed me Mr. Thomas Mercer was on the point of leaving the company; but, being a total stranger to my talent, she must require a specimen of my abilities, before she could make me an offer of any description. It was therefore agreed, that I should play Henry, in Speed the Plough, for Mr. Hallam's benefit, on W■■■■ day evening. At ■■■■ theatre, I was introduced to her brother, Mr. George Jefferson; it was ■■■■ building, regularly built, ■■■■ capable of holding from sixty to seventy pounds. I was much pleased with the manner in which the ■■■■ was conducted. ■■■■ dows played Tyke with a feeling and talent rarely seen in a country theatre, and the whole performance was such as to make me anxious to become a member of the company. On ■■■■ ednesday, I appeared in Henry, to a house fortunately well ■■■■ The actor being a favourite, the debut was pronounced

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

so promising, that I was offered fifteen shillings per week, the highest salary given, which I cheerfully accepted, really happy that I had obtained a situation. The following gentlemen composed the company:—Mr. Jefferson, stage manager; Mr. Brewer, Mr. Meadows, Mr. Mercer, Mr. Hallam, Mr. George, Mr. Martin, Mr. Bristow, Mr. J. O'Connor, Samuel Butler, Mr. Storer, Mr. Butler, Mrs. Murray, Mr. Mercer, Mr. Craven, Miss Secker, Mr. Butler, Mr. Martin; which list I have to add, Mr. Wemyss. In Mrs. Butler's company I acted three years, a very laughable adventure in place, arising from the closing of the theatre during the Passion Week. On these occasions, generally, the themselves small parties of four and five, and visit the villages in the neighbourhood, dramatic are a longer period three or four nights. A party description, consisting of Mr. Mercer, Mr. Meadows, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. Murray, Mr. Craven, having announced George Barnwell for representation, Mr. Kirby Longdale, found themselves deficient in numbers to complete the cast, and, as leader of our orchestra, Mr. William Mercer, had accompanied them, they persuaded him to make his first appearance on any stage, the Uncle, in George Barnwell. As he frequently boasted, that the young lads (as he used to call them, although he was but twenty-five years of age himself) knew nothing of acting, he would do it, if only to show them what it was. Therefore, having diligently perfected himself in the words of the author, (which, at rehearsal, he spoke very well, but with a broad Yorkshire dialect,) he prepared to give the lads a lesson, which was to be service during their natural lives. When he arrived, great fright deprived him of his courage—he could scarcely utter a word. Being cleared for his entrance, he commenced thus—

"If I were superstitious now."—(A pause.)

"If I were superstitious."—(Another pause.)

"If I was superstitious, I should say." (Aside)—"Tom, why don't you tell me?"

But Tom, who played George Barnwell, did not let him off so easily, but remained in his retirement, convulsed with laughter. So the Uncle was compelled to proceed, which he did, thus—

"Oh, religion is a thing."—(A pause.)

"Religion is much."—(Another pause.)

"Religion is—Oh, Tom, I say, do stick me." (Aside.)

To this Tom replied, in the words of the Author—"Oh, it is impossible." This line produced such a ludicrous effect upon the audience, who had become aware of the matter, that the only thing to restore gravity was to despatch the Uncle as quick as possible: but [redacted] was not to be so easily done. [redacted] William [redacted] memory had, by this time, returned—[redacted] suddenly exclaimed, "Stop, Tom, I know it now—I repeat every word of it." And he began—"If I [redacted] superstitious now, I should say"—dingle, dingle, [redacted] the [redacted] ter's bell, [redacted] down [redacted] [redacted] curtain, [redacted] [redacted] uproarious laughter of [redacted] audience; and so ended the third act of [redacted] tragedy of George Barnwell, and the last attempt of Mr. [redacted] to give practical lessons in acting.

[redacted] Kendal being concluded, [redacted] next proceeded [redacted] Northallerton, in Yorkshire. This distance is something over sixty miles, which, on a fine summer morning, [redacted] pany with O'Conner, Meadows, William Mercer, [redacted] Mr. Kelly, I started to walk. We allowed ourselves two days [redacted] accomplish the task, walking twenty miles before [redacted] first day, fourteen to dinner, and fourteen after dinner; thus accomplishing forty-eight miles the first day, over a mountainous country, and leisurely walking fifteen miles [redacted] following day. He accustomed had I become to fatigue of this description, that a walk of thirty miles [redacted] no common occurrence, for a day's amusement, when we had [redacted] act [redacted] night.

In Northallerton we remained six weeks, when [redacted] repaired to the [redacted] [redacted] Beverley, and from thence [redacted] Harrogate Springs, for the [redacted] Here [redacted] was I first met the most eccentric of all mad tragedians. He [redacted] the [redacted] London star I ever acted with, and at that time in the height of his popularity. Who could have supposed that the "Wilford," who trembled with fear before [redacted] little tragedian, [redacted] Harrogate, in 1815, should, years afterwards, have paid him thousands of dollars as the manager of an American theatre?

BOOTH,

[redacted] performance of Bertram, at this time, was terrifically grand. [redacted] mind was in its [redacted] vigour, [redacted] a well cultivated soil it [redacted] A [redacted] delightful companion, "when [redacted] in his mood," [redacted] would [redacted] to find. Gifted with powers of conversation [redacted] [redacted] agreeable, master of [redacted] [redacted] Lucius Junius Booth was born [redacted] control those over whom he wished to cast a spell of fascination. He [redacted] the only actor [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] strength with Kean—failing only through his own imprudence—trifling with [redacted] reputation—and [redacted] the same time with the public, who were desirous of fostering talent, which [redacted] suddenly burst upon [redacted] in a blaze of [redacted] [redacted] first played [redacted] Covent Garden, then at Drury Lane, then back to Covent Garden, until he was finally driven from the London stage, stamped with fame and character, to realise a fortune in the provincial theatres.

He was accused of being a servile imitator of Kean, which being reiterated by the London Press, became a received opinion, but a very erroneous one. It was only necessary to see the two actors on the stage together, to dispel it at once.—Booth felt and acted, when on the stage with Kean, as if conscious of his inferiority, which he candidly acknowledged; but, when separated, there are many of Kean's warmest admirers who do not hesitate to pronounce his performance of Richard equal, and his Hamlet superior, to Kean's representation of the same characters.

As I shall frequently have to mention Mr. Booth again, I shall only observe that he played three nights at Harrogate, and three nights at Ripon, in the same week, and left us all delighted with his acting, and equally well pleased with him off the stage.

Here, also, I met Mrs. Powel, of Drury Lane, (Mrs. Renand,) the rival of the great Mrs. Siddons, who, when young, must have been a beautiful woman. Her acting spoke more to the heart than that of any lady I ever saw before or since, identifying herself with the character she was performing, you forgot the woman and the actress. The first part I acted with her was Jaffier, in Venice Preserved. I had requested her indulgence in the morning at rehearsal, on two accounts—the first, the short time I had allowed for preparation, and second, the consciousness of my inability to support her properly—but that I would do the best I could with a part far beyond my ability, and of which I knew nothing but the words. In the kindest manner, she repeated the part to me, impressing upon my mind those portions of the dialogue usually producing the greatest effect upon an audience. For her tuition I owed the success of my performance, and as we left the stage, at the end of the first act, her expression of “Very well, indeed, sir—excellent,” enabled me to proceed with that confidence which, in an actor, is the sure forerunner of success. The press complimented me highly on this performance, and even the manager condescended to appear in the green-room. For years afterwards, I used to consider Jaffier my best part, and felt a desire to act it, long after I had ceased to appear in tragedy. Mrs. Renand remained with us one year, playing a few nights in each town, and then us in Kendal, in 1817, to join the Edinburgh company, where she remained until her death. Her performance of Elvira, Pizarro, and Alicia, in Jane Shore, was the perfection of the dramatic art; while her Lady Macbeth, although not so powerful, was second only to Mrs. Siddons. How they could spare such an actress from the London boards, was a question very often, but not readily answered. Oh, Managers! Managers!

The eventful year of 1815 was made remarkable by another remarkable . . . . In company with Mr. George . . . O'Connor, I had paid a visit to the city of York, where the theatre . . . then under the management of Mr. Fitzgerald.—The play . . . the Fortune of War, the allusion; the Wandering Boys, in which Man-el, famous for a well-written Defence of the Stage, was acting Count de Crolay, when a gentleman in the dress circle of boxes suddenly placed his feet upon the cushion of the band rail, and holding himself in that position by the pillar of the boxes, with morose breath enough to make himself distinctly heard demanded that the performer should cease, until he addressed the audience.—This . . . by hisses, and cries of "turn him out," until, amid . . . uproar, . . . name of Bonaparte was heard, followed by a cry of "hear him, hear him." . . . proceeded nearly thus, . . . agitation choking his utterance:—"Gentlemen, I have . . . pleasure—to inform you—Napoleon Bonaparte—has surrendered himself a prisoner of war—(dead silence, every one intent upon catching the next word)—to Captain Maitland, of . . . Majesty's ship Belleroophon." . . . whole audience rose— . . . followed cheer—the men waved their hats, the ladies their handkerchiefs—God save the King . . . called for—the whole company, male . . . female, appeared upon the stage, sang the national anthem, the audience joining in the chorus. At . . . conclusion, three cheers were given—Rule . . . played by the band, and three-fourths of the audience immediately left the theatre, to talk of the . . . and . . . ask each other if it could be true. . . . my . . . visit to the York theatre. My readers will . . . tell me, that it was not easily to . . . forgotten.

From Harrogate . . . proceeded to Richmond, in Yorkshire, crossed . . . Northallerton, for the . . . week, returning . . . Richmond; and, at the close of the season, taking . . . departure for Whitby, where we remained during the winter, and opened the spring campaign . . . Ripon; from thence to Beverley; back . . . Harrogate and Richmond; then, over the mountains, to Ulverstone, in Lancashire, and Kendal, in Westmoreland—thus performing my first tour of a regular provincial circuit, occupying two years, from my first joining . . . company at Kendal; during which time Mr Meadows, . . . Hallam, Mr. and Mrs. Mercer, Mr. Brewer, Mr. Bristol, . . . Miss Craven, left us, their places being supplied by Mr. Calvert, (then playing under the name of Young, but . . . known by his contest with . . . Rev. Mr. Best, and his admir- . . . gentleman's . . . the . . .

professors,) Mr. O'Connor, Mr. Francis O'Connor, [redacted] ner, and Miss Stannard.

It was during my stay in Mrs. Butler's company, I had the misfortune to lose the friend and protector of my youth, Mr. Thomas Courtney, jun. He died in London, during the month of October, 1817; but he lives in my heart, and will continue there until that heart ceases to beat. Those only who knew his worth could appreciate his loss.

Requiescat in pace.

In [redacted] Butler's company I remained nearly three [redacted] during which time an attachment had taken place between Miss Bu [redacted] myself, which [redacted] the [redacted] of my [redacted] departure. No objection was offered to our marriage by the friends of either party, but our [redacted] youth. I was scarcely twenty years of age, and the young lady not more than seventeen. I [redacted] agreed by all parties, that we should separate for twelve months, [redacted] the expiration of which time, [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] steadfast in our affections, [redacted] were to be united, with the perfect approbation of our [redacted]. Under this arrangement we parted, breathing vows [redacted] constancy, [redacted] to [redacted] again.

Mr. Munden, of Drury Lane theatre, procured me a situation with Mr. Dowton, in Canterbury, at a salary of twenty-five shillings per week, where I arrived in January, 1818, making [redacted] appearance as Rover, in O'Keefe's play of [redacted] Oats. The company consisted of Mr. Hamerton, (the stage manager,) Mr. W. Dowton, [redacted] H. Dowton, Mr. Wharton, Mr. Owen, Mr. John Sloman,) [redacted] Marshall, Mr. Hamerton, jun., Mr. Jeffries, Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Wemyss; and, shortly afterwards, [redacted] Calcraft, Miss Barry, Mrs. H. Dowton, (afterwards Mrs. J. Sloman, Mrs. Owen, Miss Leigh, [redacted] Kennedy, Mrs. Hamerton, jun. A company of handsomer [redacted] I never saw collected within the [redacted] of a theatre.

The four months I passed in Canterbury was really a round of delight. Miss Barry led the way, with a soirée party, which was repeated by the ladies alternately, every non-play night; while each Wednesday night we played in Faversham, starting in coaches [redacted] provided for that purpose, after dinner, and returning after the play to Canterbury, forming a trip of pleasure occasionally made uncomfortable by a rainy day; but so full of fun and good humour, that we were like so many school-boys let loose for a holiday.

From Canterbury we proceeded to Rochester. In this city I first became familiar with the faces of the London actors, every week bringing down some star to grace our little theatre. Notwithstanding all which attractions, and the garrison at Chatham, Rochester is the worst theatrical town I ever acted in, in England. Here I was first introduced to that bright luminary of the stage, shall I attempt to describe "the star" of British stage man, who, without a single friend, insurmountable; and, by one bold effort, swept cold polished school of Kemble stage, astonishing the English metropolis by his bold natural conception of character, which he executed in such a style of excellence, "no but himself could parallel." Treated indifference, amounting almost to insult, by the actors and actresses who the "person" the night of his appearance the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane; and finding, before the end of the dignified ladies and gentlemen, who would scarcely with civility the salute of an obscure country actor, among his most servile flatterers—filling the theatre nightly to overflowing—rejecting the society of the noble and learned—seeking his companions among those actors whom he had known in adversity, and to whom he ever proved a kind friend—he moved like a comet, to be wondered at, but not approached. Throughout triumphal career,—raising the prostrate fortunes of the theatre to which he attached—reigning sole monarch, without a rival, in the estimation of the public,—and yielding at last, a broken spirit, in one great effort to his fame.

Whatever may have been the faults of his private life, his public a triumph of genius over prejudice; and the Edmund Kean, like that of Garrick, will descend posterity, as "the actor" of age.

The first time I ever saw him act, I played Wellborn, to his Sir Giles Overreach, in Manning's Play of A New Way to Pay Old. With the exception of my appearance at Glasgow, I never suffered so much from stage fright; but his known kindness and affability, to of every grade, soon removed my embarrassment. I supped him after the performance, and, from that hour, he became my friend. Many years afterwards, in Baltimore, I good fortune to extricate from a most unpleasant and dangerous situation. But, of this, hereafter,—if, good reader, travel me across the Atlantic.

Mrs. Glover paid us a flying visit, during which I acted, for the first time, the part of Frank Heartall, in Cherry's comedy of the Soldier's Daughter. Charles Woodley should have been my character on the occasion, but Calcraft being absent, I was compelled to assume the light comedy hero. There ward, Mr. Hereford, Mr. Perry, Mr. Stanhope, Mr. and Mrs. Brooke, Miss Danby, Mrs. R. Danby, Miss R. Stannard, Mrs. Norris, Mrs. Cowell and Mrs. Wemyss.

The manager was pleased to express to me satisfaction in my conduct during the time I remained a member of the company, which was nearly three years. I enjoyed much felicity in the role of a country actor. Respected by the manager, one of the few members of the company in private parties, held in estimation by the audience, my pockets filled, my theatrical wardrobe increased, I had become an object of envy to many of my brother performers, I had nothing left to desire for—but a London engagement. Could I have divested myself of ambition, I could have terminated my theatrical career on the Lincoln circuit, possessed of a handsome competence. We visited Peterborough, Spalding, Boston, Lincoln, Newark-upon-Trent, Stamford, Wisbeach, Whittlesea, and Huntingdon, in each of which I had the fourth part of a benefit; that is to say, the first of two performers were announced at the head of the bills, and they shared the amount of the house with the manager, after eight pounds. This is decidedly the most equitable mode of giving benefit—the actor risking nothing but his personal exertions, in case of failure; if successful, the manager received a portion of the gain, to bear the cost of a less profitable night—by which every actor is certain of obtaining some little emolument from the night intended for his benefit. My finances were never in such flourishing state, although I have received ten pounds of weekly salary.

A country actor, of rising reputation, looks forward with feverish anxiety to the moment that will allow him the opportunity of trying his powers before a metropolitan audience—that test of merit which proves fatal to so many, and from which there is no appeal. Let an actor, on his first appearance in London, be rejected, and his prospects are blighted for ever. He returns to the country a ruined man (professionally,) managers rarely feeling disposed to offer engagements under such circumstances, and the public ready to pronounce his return a just retribution for his presumption. But if success crown his efforts, and the theatres in which he has previously played be scarcely large enough to admit the numbers which will nightly flock to his performance, each town claiming the merit of having first discovered and fostered his talent.

Formerly, a London engagement was the acme of an actor's wishes. Once there, he was fixed for life, or during good fortune. Not so now. A London engagement is the precarious; caprice of the manager of new faces on the part of the public, with a hundred other minor causes, render the London actor (unless on the topmost round of the ladder) the most dependent of his tribe. He is not sure of his engagement from season to season. Thus, country actors have lost half those ardent feelings of romance, which determine to stop at nothing short of the accomplishment of their desires. The ultimate reward of their poverty and professional toil has faded from their view, the spirit of emulation slumbers if it be not entirely destroyed, and without a vigorous effort to reform existing abuses, the drama, which has withstood for ages the attacks of bigots, will fall a victim to the suicidal acts of its own professors.

In September, 1818, Mr. Cowell left us, in the city of Lincoln, to try his fortune at Drury Lane. He appeared there on the 8th of October, being fully unsuccessful. We all felt pride at his having established himself with the London public: [redacted] was extremely popular with my both before [redacted] behind [redacted] curtain. His loss was supplied by Mr. Meadows, of Bath, whom I [redacted] not seen since he left Butler's company, and from whom I [redacted] indebted to him for my recommendation to the situation I now held. Our acquaintance was renewed, and ripened into a friendship which remains firm to this day. He is one of those members of the profession of whose friendship I feel proud, and whose conduct does honour to the stage. He spent the summer season with us, and returned in the winter to Bath, where he was held in high estimation.

He was succeeded by another equally worthy, but quite an original, Wilkinson, of the English Opera House, London, whose admirable performance of Geoffrey Hamnap, in Peake's farce of "Amateurs and Actors," stamped his name as one of the best low comedians of the day. He passed the winter with [redacted] in Boston, and returned to London in the spring. He is another who may [redacted] held up as an example of what actors ought to be—upright, honest and honourable in all his dealings, a warm friend, and an excellent husband and father.

During the race week at Huntingdon, in the autumn of 1819, while acting the part of Charles Surface, in the "School for Scandal," my memory suddenly abandoned me on the stage, notwithstanding the word was freely given, not only by the prompter, but by the actors on the stage. I could not recollect one single sentence, but was forced to retire up the stage, and seat myself. The audience, knowing I was generally correct in the words of my author, loudly applauded, while I remained at least a minute, unconscious of any thing around me; when, bowing to the audience, I resumed the part as fluently as if no interruption had taken place. How to account for this singular event, I am at a loss, even now, twenty years after its [redacted] I had played the part before, was perfect to a monosyllable, yet [redacted] not think of a single word, and excited a degree of [redacted] whenever the subject was [redacted] to. Never [redacted] did I appear on the stage in this character without a feeling of doubt and fear, and an anxiety to finish the second speech in the fourth act as rapidly as possible.

From Huntingdon [redacted] went to Whittlesea in [redacted] Ely, where, for the [redacted] and only time in my theatrical career, I appeared [redacted] stage in a state of intoxication. Being holiday time, I was induced to taste some [redacted] English ale, brewed expressly for this festival, kept by all [redacted] farmers in the neighbourhood, who with [redacted] other as [redacted] the age and strength of their malt liquor, freely disbursed among their friends. Although I did not drink more than one glass, so powerful was the effect, that I soon became aware I was "non compos" however, [redacted] the theatre I [redacted] Whether the glare of the Flood aided the fumes of the liquor, I know not, but well do I remember, that no answer did I return, but a laugh, to all [redacted] Roy's flaming speeches—not [redacted] word of the part of Rashleigh Oswaldstone [redacted] I utter during the whole performance. I laughed, [redacted] the audience laughed with me, or at me; [redacted] they hissed me it would have [redacted] to their credit, and what I richly merited. The crime carried along with it the punishment—a [redacted] —and long did I remember [redacted] feeling of shame with which I encountered my manager on the following morning; he said not a word, but he looked—what he thought he ought to say. According to the rules of the theatre, I had forfeited all claim to my salary, and wishing to avoid a lecture, I did not go near the treasury until [redacted] for, when Mr. Robertson addressed me nearly thus:—"Young man, your own sense of right and wrong, and the deep contrition you have shown for your impropriety of conduct, will make a more lasting impression than any harshness I can inflict—there [redacted] your money—your only reproach will [redacted] to mention the subject [redacted]"

This well-timed lenity had its effect; but Mr. [redacted] always knew how to make himself respected, [redacted] when [redacted] pelled to censure. The collected profession could not have surprised [redacted] [redacted] guard on any occasion after this, when I had my duty [redacted] perform at [redacted] theatre in the evening; but such was the just manner in [redacted] the Lincoln manager conducted all the affairs of his company; it was a rule with him, that all forfeiture of salary, for neglect, belonged to the actors, and should, on no occasion, be allowed to find its way into the manager's pocket; the forfeits, therefore, were cheerfully [redacted] whenever incurred, and a fund created, from which [redacted] [redacted] and from which the members of the company derived a source of gratification and social intercourse—a supper or dinner being given regularly once a year. If that (aid) amounted to a sufficient sum, they were appropriated to defray the expenses. If the calls upon the fund had been too frequent, or too forfeitures had been incurred, the manager cheerfully made good the difference, with a complimentary speech on the good behaviour of the company for the season. Mr Robertson was regarded more like the father of the troupe, than the director of a theatre; and were I asked to point on a strictly just and honest man, Mr. Thomas Robertson, the Lincoln manager, would be the first I should mention. His health, his industry, and his prosperity to him and his, is my fervent wish. We parted the best of friends; and, should fate ordain we meet again, the hearty shake of the hand, a genuine mark of friendship, would be cordially reciprocated.

Of Mrs T. Robertson, it is unnecessary to say much. She has been an excellent actress; and although somewhat impaired by age, there are few of the younger ladies in the profession who possess her amount of animal spirits, which she is the author of much merriment, and a woman possessing a strong, well cultivated mind.

In the month of August, 1819, I received an offer from Mr. Macready, leader of the Theatre Royal, Bristol, of two pounds per week, and the clerk of the receipts of a benefit. Before accepting this offer, I laid before Mr. Robertson, asking his advice, which he gave in the most friendly manner, adding, "I shall be sorry to see you, but it is for your reputation will be increased, and I would make the trial: but I exact from you a promise, if you find yourself uncomfortable, that you accept of other situation without first writing me." I therefore accepted Mr. Macready, in the full hope my appearance at Bristol would be the stepping-stone to a London engagement.

Bristol Theatre was open on Monday evening, the 15th of November; and the first time I played in the Lincoln company, on the 18th of October, 1819, which occasion Mr. Bayner, now of Covent Garden Theatre, made his first appearance as Tyke, in the "School of Rascals." I played Mr. Ferment; and how a London audience could tolerate Mr. Bayner's Tyke, with Emery's performance of the same part vivid in their recollection, is a theatrical paradox which not unfrequently occurs. Without any disparagement to Mr. Bayner's talents, Mr. Meadows was as far superior to him, in Tyke, as John Kemble was Mr. Barrymore, in Hamlet.

Before I took a final adieu to Lincoln, I ought to mention, in a trip of pleasure to London, to spend the Passion Week, I saw on Easter Monday, Mr. Buck's tragedy of "The Italians,* damned at Drury Lane Theatre. It was the first time I had ever witnessed any thing of the kind, and I had been so much of novelty to recommended it. The pit, however, indulged in the motion formerly known as the "O. P. dance;" this, with the discordant yells of the gallery, the cheering and clapping of hands in the boxes, laid in a reasonable stock of headache for a week. The first sign of decided hostility was shown to Mr. H. Kemble, who played one of the heroes; "Kemble, do your duty," from an auditor in the pit, was the signal for a general attack. Had Mr. Buck's friends been less noisy, the play might have escaped, but the display of a placard, prepared for the purpose, reading thus—"Will a British public suffer a villainous actor (alluding to Kean) and his pot companions, to trample on deserving Englishmen?" was the signal for the play. Mr. Mac and Mr. Glover were the only two individuals who obtained any thing like a hearing, the ladies, Mr. Glover in particular, were in for a full measure of censure. Mr. Stephen Kemble, at length came forward, commencing an address, with, "Ladies and gentlemen, I assure you I was called out of town"—a wag in the gallery, asked in the same tone of voice, "Why the devil did you not take the 'Italians' with you?"

He was followed by a roar of laughter, and the manager could no longer succeed in obtaining a hearing. The tumult became louder every moment, until a placard was displayed, in the centre of the stage, with the words,—"The Italians, withdrawn."

Three cheers followed the annunciation, and in a few minutes the house was empty, leaving the actors to enjoy themselves by themselves.

CHAPTER VI.

Royal Bristol. First Night of the Season. Success in Rover. Macready the Manager, and Macready the Tragedian. The Son. The Theatre. Domestic Intrigue. Managerial Discipline. Departure for Bristol. Royal Deaths. Fire. Actors' Losses. Kindness of the People at Easter. Oppression of Managers. Open Rebellion. First Attempt at Management.

I left Lincoln on Wednesday, the 20th of October, 1819; spent a fortnight in London, during which time I visited the theatre every night, and arriving in Bristol on Saturday morning, the 18th of November, found my name announced for Rover, in "The Outs," for Monday evening. I upon Mr. Macready, to report my arrival, and securing lodgings in King's street, a few doors from the theatre, prepared to open the campaign, which the manager himself had pronounced in the following manner :—

"MR. MACREADY respectfully acquaints the men of Bristol, and its vicinity, that during the vacation every possible exertion has been made to complete the decorations and embellishments of this theatre, in a style worthy the inhabitants of a city second only to the metropolis of the nation. In this undertaking, the gratification and accommodation of the public in general, have superseded every other consideration. The first mechanics have been employed, and without any comment on the actors' abilities, their efforts will be submitted to the opinion, judgment, decision, and support of the Bristol audience."

On entering the theatre on Monday morning, I was rejoiced to find Miss Leigh, whom I had formerly known in Canterbury, was engaged as the first comedy actress; this was an agreeable meeting to both parties, for of all the annoyance to which an actor is subjected, there is none so horrible as a first rehearsal in a new company. The nods, the winks, the observations, made sufficiently loud to be overheard, and the strictures passed upon the new comers, have shaken the nerves of some of the oldest stagers.

However, time, which for no one brought on so early an hour to commence the performance. During the day I had felt more than usually nervous; the thought of playing Rover on those boards, where Lewis, Elliston, and Stanley, had in turn been the favourites of the audience, in the same character, which was to prove the touchstone of my own abilities, had rendered me doubtful of success.

On my first appearance I was most cordially received by an excellent house; the first scene passed off smoothly, but in the middle of my second scene, the gas was suddenly extinguished, and the whole house left for several minutes in complete darkness. This was an awkward occurrence, but it put the audience in good humour, and the play proceeded with much spirit. As I left the stage, at the end of the fourth act, I received two distinct rounds of applause, the most cheering sounds to me I ever heard within the walls of a theatre. I was again warmly applauded in the scene in Banks' cottage, and was flattering myself with a triumph, all but won, when the unfortunate gas was again extinguished, and all efforts to rekindle the flame proved abortive. We had to finish the play by the aid of a dozen tallow candles, hastily caught up from all quarters of the theatre. Thus ended my first appearance in Bristol. The press, the following day, was loud in my praise, and I was convinced I had made a most favourable impression on my audience.

My second appearance was in Doricourt, in the "Belle's Stratagem;" third, as Sir George Airy, in the Bury Body;" and Dewlas, in the "Law," &c. &c.

I was better received by any audience before I have the honour of playing, than by the citizens of Bristol. Congratulated upon my success from all quarters, I looked forward to a pleasant winter season, but my sojourn with Mr. Macready was destined to prove of short duration.

I received a letter from London, dated December 2d, 1819, informing me of the death of my beloved grandmother. This blow, although long expected, was a painful bereavement. Brought up under her eye, born under her roof, and accustomed to regard her with even more reverence than my own parents, it was but natural I should be anxious to pay the last mournful office of respect by being present at her funeral. I requested Mr. Macready's permission, which he had the brutality to withhold. I resolved on all hazards to go to London, and communicated to him my resolution; his answer was in keeping with his previous refusal. He told me "to go at my peril." I did go, and the breach of my engagement had its consequences.

I returned on Thursday evening, and on the next night, Saturday, ready to play Colonel Mannering on the Monday, which I found myself announced. He refused to pay me a single shilling for the past week, and when I expressed myself perfectly willing to leave the theatre, and abandon my engagement, he gave me notice for the six weeks he was giving him six weeks notice. This I complied with, and immediately wrote to Messrs. Bennet & Hughes, of Exeter, from whom I received an acknowledgment of engagement, by the return of mail. No notice was Macready acquainted with this fact, than he expressed a desire to retain me for the expiration of the six weeks he insisted upon my remaining one week longer, to make up the time I had devoted to my domestic troubles, and for which he had already deprived me of a week's income. This it was impossible to comply with, and he retained a balance of five pounds sterling which he owed me, and which I never received, although, after my departure, feeling somewhat ashamed of his conduct, he asserted publicly in the green-room that he had sent the money after me. It may have been so, for I believe he was an honest man, but if such a letter was ever forwarded to Exeter it never came to hand.

Notwithstanding the great cause I have to complain of Mr. Macready's conduct toward me, yet I learned more during my short stay in his company, of the practical part of my profession, than any two years of past experience had afforded me. He was a strict disciplinarian—one of the best instructors of acting I ever met, but a perfect oddity in his manner of imparting that instruction. Billy Lancelotti, of whom singular anecdotes are related, was the only man who completely how to manage him. Many a pound note, in addition to his regular salary, has he received for obligations conferred, by acting parts at short notice, when a sudden discharge of some member of the company, for real or supposed offence, had created a vacuum in the dramatic personae of the play of the evening.

One anecdote I will relate, before I bid him adieu, which will serve to illustrate his general character, and manner of transacting business. Mr. Darley and Mr. Garthwaite, sustaining two characters in a play, in which it was necessary for both to wear their hats, Mr. Darley had neglected to take his on stage, for which he forfeited both the actors, alleging that Mr. Darley had transgressed the rules of the theatre by appearing on the stage improperly dressed, and that Garthwaite deserved to be forfeited, for not laying his hat aside, and thus exposing to the audience the fault of his companion. To this act of injustice Garthwaite refused to submit, and actually left the theatre. He was engaged from the York Theatre some time afterwards, but refused with Macready until he consented to return the forfeit, and acknowledge himself in error; not a very difficult matter to effect, for once convinced he was wrong, he was ever willing to make reparation.

While in Bristol I first met

WILLIAM MACREADY,

a gentleman who deservedly ranks high, as one of the most finished actors of the English stage. Indebted to nature for no personal requisite, but by laborious study, and love of his profession, attaining eminence. He is a polished scholar and a gentleman, although one. In the study of his profession, he possessed advantages, in the tuition of his father, which must have made an actor of any young man possessing one-tenth of Macready's ability. No wonder, then, he rose so rapidly to fame, aided by such parts for originals as Gambia, Pescara, Amurath, and Ludovico, and surrounded by such actors as Young, Charles Kemble, and Miss O'Neill, to call forth all the powers of a cultivated actor. To Mr. Shiel's tragedies he owes his present position; and well did he repay the author for confiding to his hands the daring villains of his creation.

On his first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre, it wanted but one laugh to have turned all the laboured efforts of the actor into ridicule. Had the sizzling which comon the first bench of the pit, a little further, gentleman, who justly prides himself on having placed plays of Shakspere before his countrymen in their garb, would have returned to the country a broken-hearted rejected actor ! men, Vandenhoff, possessing iron nerve sufficient to encounter two failures, yet finally good his position on the London stage.

but two nights, "Coriolanus" "Richard Third." By a singular chance, played the same part at Bath on the same night, which, as I had seen Macready play that part at Covent Garden, I took the opportunity of paying a visit to my friend Messrs. for the purpose of witnessing. At I introduced Mr. Woulda, Rowbotham, Mr. Cunwy and Mr. Paul Bedford, pleasant hours we spent together.

In the month of January, 1820, I started from Bristol, in a storm, on my journey to Exeter, where I arrived safely, found myself underlined for Bover, Wednesday evening ; but I found the whole city in a state of commotion, in consequence of the death of the Duke of Kent, (the of Queen Victoria,) for whose reception a box had been splendidly fitted up at the theatre, which he was to have visited on Monday evening. By the advice of the mayor, the theatre was closed for one week, as a mark of respect to the memory of the royal duke. Thus, the managers not only lost the profits of an overflowing house, but the lost their week's salary ; this was the first stumbling block in an unlucky of unlucky seasons.

On the following Monday I opened in Bover. The company of Mr. Bennett and Mr. Hughes, (the managers,) Mr. Harvey, Mr. W. H. Bennett, Mr. Dawson, Mr. J. Dawson, Mr. Butler, Mr. J. Salter, Mr. Libby, Mr. Harris, Mr. Southey, (brother of the post laureate of England,) Mrs. Hughes, Bennett, Dawson, Mrs. Harvey, and, shortly afterwards, Miss Leigh. My first appearance was pronounced satisfactory, both to the audience and the managers ; but treated me scurvily. Scarcely I played one week before the of King, (George the Third,) again the theatre, during a general mourning of three weeks.

The managers devoted this forced vacation to the production of "Rochester," which had been successful in London, at the Olympic Theatre, under the direction of Mr. Elliston. The piece was furnished with appropriate scenery, dresses and properties, was well rehearsed, and placed before the audience in a style of perfection not often witnessed in a provincial theatre. The house was crowded on the first representation, and the success perfect. After the second performance, about one o'clock in the morning, I was aroused by a violent knocking at my bed-room door, and a request from Mr. Bennett, who was much afflicted with asthma, for God's sake to take the key and run as fast as possible to the theatre—which I did. I was the last actor to reach the spot, just in time to see the end in : my hope of rescuing any thing from the theatre, was at an end. By great exertions the flames were prevented from spreading devastation all around. The morning dawned on a heap of smouldering ruins, and a company of actors out of fortune. This was the first theatre I ever had the misfortune to belong to which was destroyed by fire, although conflagrations, during my career, have been very numerous.

The people of Exeter, with a praiseworthy spirit, set on foot a subscription for the relief of the actors, and in less than forty-eight hours a sum amounting to one hundred and seventy pounds was received, which was distributed among those who lost their theatrical property by the same occurrence.

One of the New Assembly buildings, leading to Northernhay, that was only roofed in, granted me the use of the building. Messrs. Bland and Hughes, and by magical rapidity, we played in an entire new theatre on the following Monday. The scenery was brought from the Dock (now Devonport) Theatre—the dresses for "Rochester," made up by the assistance of countless volunteers. We opened to a splendid house, and "Rochester" had a most successful run. This misfortune occurred on the 5th of March, 1820.

The managers were not insured, and consequently were heavy losers; but by exertions of the most indefatigable nature, they succeeded in having their theatre rebuilt, and opened on the 10th of January, in the following year, 1821. It was without exception the most beautiful theatre out of London. The building was destroyed by fire, the matter is surmise, but it was generally attributed to the introduction of the gas. An immense chandelier was suspended from the centre of the dome, from which the audience part of the theatre was solely lighted; the continued heat in so confined a space, was supposed to have produced spontaneous combustion; the fire originated in the roof, and cannot reasonably be attributed to any other source.

This season was a most disastrous one to the actors, who lost six weeks' salary in four months. It is true the managers, also, had been great sufferers, but they possessed other resources—they had a theatre in Plymouth, another in Dock, besides Weymouth and Totnes, and a theatre in the Isle of Guernsey; to any one of which they could have repaired, with an assurance of success. They preferred availing themselves of the sympathy of the public of Exeter, warmly awakened in their behalf, and had no cause to complain of the result, the receipts having exceeded their sanguine expectations. It was with feelings of surprise, therefore, we saw a notice posted in the green-room, that the salaries would be reduced during the ensuing season at Plymouth.

My proposition, under the circumstances, was unjust. The company had borne patiently the deprivations of the season, and had curtailed more than one-third of their income—they had, and all, strenuously contributed to the completion of the temporary theatre, so fortunately thrown in my way—the company had reaped a rich harvest from those exertions, and the reward of the actor was to be a permanent reduction of his salary during the whole season, at Plymouth and Dock, (Devonport,)—a most ungenerous and parsimonious, which I, for one, determined not to submit to.

A meeting of the company was called, to take into consideration this proposition of the managers, which I proposed a resolution, that rather than submit to the terms offered, we should form a strolling expedition, on our own account, or take the Plymouth Theatre on our own responsibility, as a commonwealth, paying the managers such a rent for the use of their property as might be agreed on between us. This last proposition was rejected by Messrs. Bonnet and Hughes, the alternative presented, to accept their terms or close the theatre altogether, until the summer season at Weymouth.

I offered to advance forty pounds sterling, without any consideration, the payment of the money at the first meeting of the treasury should contain as much over the current expenses, for the strolling expedition. This plan was organised by myself, Mr. Dawson, Mr. J. Dawson, and Mr. Butler, who seceded from the theatre, taking with us Mr. and Mrs. Bouthey, Miss Leigh, Mrs. Dawson, Mr. Harris, and Mr. Libby, adding Miss L. Leigh, and Mr. and Mrs. Osbaldistone. I am sure the latter gentleman then never dreamt of being the lessee of the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, London, or F. C. Wemyss of being manager of the Chesham street Theatre, Philadelphia, when we entered our first managerial speculation, into which we were driven more by necessity than choice.

VIL

Rural Wanderings. Castle of Exeter. Tarrington. Liskeard. Plymouth. Letter from an Aged Mother. Booth and Clara Fisher. First Offer of a London Engagement. Robert Gore Elliston, the Napoleon of the Drama. All at Coventry. Actors in Durana, of the Coronation. Politics Interrupting Pleasure. Wigan. can Engagement all but Abandoned. First Starring Expedition. Preparations for a Long Voyage.

W<sup>e</sup> ~~arranged~~ ~~our~~ ~~own~~ arrangement ~~at~~ Great Torrington, in Devonshire, a very pretty romantic ~~town~~, about thirty miles ~~from~~ Exeter. Our plan ~~was~~ to ~~pay~~ ~~one~~ pound sterling per week ~~to~~ each individual, the ~~whole~~ to ~~be~~ appropriated to a general fund, to provide against ~~any~~ Mr. W~~atson~~. Butler, ~~and~~ Osbaldistone, ~~and~~ Mr. J. Dawson, ~~and~~ appointed managers—one of ~~the~~ four to have sole ~~and~~ undivided control ~~of~~ the ~~business~~ of the company, alternately, ~~in~~ each ~~place~~ we might visit. ~~Each~~ cast lots for precedence, and it ~~was~~ my lot ~~to~~ commence; consequently, I had all the trouble of organizing ~~the~~ new scheme. The scenery was really handsome; we hired a tolerable wardrobe from ~~the~~ Libby, and started, ~~at~~ ~~the~~ of the Exeter season, well equipped.

In ~~the~~ Torrington, I ~~was~~ ~~the~~ theatrical sceptre, over ~~a~~ but very merry ~~and~~ contented set of subjects. ~~I~~ remained in Torrington ~~for~~ months, ~~at~~ the expiration of which, we had neither ~~more~~ ~~money~~ nor diminished ~~our~~ funds: we paid our way, and ~~no~~ more. Having secured the waggons ~~to~~ transport our baggage to Liskeard, ~~in~~ Cornwall, according to agreement, I surrendered ~~the~~ power into the ~~hands~~ of Mr. James Dawson, who was to be our next governor, as the actors facetiously ~~called~~ us.

J. Dawson, Butler, and myself, started to walk to Launceston, where we intended to sleep, and proceed leisurely the next day to Liskeard, the Cornish mountains and scenery rendering this mode of travelling preferable to riding; but it was so long since I had indulged my walking propensities that I soon regretted the cross-road we were travelling. Before I had proceeded two-thirds of the distance, I found myself unequal to the task, and was glad to avail myself of a conveyance, for a few miles, in a lime cart, which overtook us, in which I enjoyed two hours as sound sleep as ever fell to the lot of a tired mortal. Dearly, however, did I pay for this luxury; a drizzling rain, denominated a Scotch mist, had been falling during a portion of the time, which, saturating my coat with unslacked lime, literally burnt it off my back, and left me, on my arrival at Launceston, ~~with~~ that precious garment, falling to pieces wherever it was touched. This misfortune was soon replaced, although I caused many a laugh at my expense, in Liskeard.

Whether it was that I was tired with my expedition, and thought the goal reached, gave me a favourable impression of the town, I am not prepared to say, but I think Lannceston, with its old fashioned and ruined castle, the most beautiful picturesque place I ever saw, surpassing Richmond, in Yorkshire, for beauty of situation. Tired as we were, we rambled about for three or four hours, and were really loth to leave the place, which we did, having fully determined to visit it professionally at the first opportunity.

While in Liskeard, in answer to a letter wherein I had recapitulated the sad mishap of my wearing apparel, I received the following from my grandfather; so characteristic of his sprightly humour of an old gentleman in his seventieth year, that I must give it an honourable place in my recollections.

(COPY.)

Lannew, August 22d, 1820.

My dear FRANK:

"The melancholy letter I am on bank post bill. You need not be lost when I have a shot in for 10l., and you shall still have the in October, you write it; for how the devil the service, if we withhold supplies, go on; and I should be very to let my lord duke go to bed supperless.

"These little, sometimes greater disasters too, oft happen gentle- of the backin.

"Mr. are well, be at the country house—will your until evening, and I was loth you should day George joins in love, and I remain,

"Your grandfather,

(Signed) Courmay.

Went.

In Liskeard I remained weeks, under the management of J. Dawson, and added a pounds to our stock: then made arrangement Bennett and Hughes for the Plymouth and Dock Theatres, where I passed the winter of 1820. Butler was the manager here, but too lazy and indolent to attend to the duties of his position. He requested me to officiate for him, for which he to give me as handsome a suit of clothes as I chose order.

In Plymouth I met Mr. Booth and Miss Clara Fisher, (then a child of seven years of age, and a most extraordinary instance of precocious dramatic talent,) to both whom I am under obligations for their liberal conduct, particularly the former, whom I had met previously at Harrogate.

Plymouth and Dock, although only two miles distant, were each their own peculiar audience. The Plymouth Theatre enjoys the privilege of a patent, is elegantly built, and as capacious as Drury Lane, or Covent Garden, being capable of containing, at country prices of admission, three hundred pounds sterling, yet rarely yielding more than thirty pounds, and frequently falling below five pounds. From its size and beauty, and being so seldom filled, it had, at the time I speak of, acquired the significant title of the Theatre of splendid misery. The Dock Theatre, on the other hand, is one of the most inconvenient in England; but for the fact of possessing a regularly fitted stage, and an excellent stock of good scenery, it is a country barn furnished up for theatrical representation, than a theatre situated in a large and flourishing town. When full, it was about eighty pounds sterling; but throughout a long season you could calculate upon an average of twenty, the inhabitants being partial to theatrical amusement, and having the garrison and dock-yards to fill in filling the house.

Here both Mr. Booth and Clara Fisher played to good houses in comparison to their receipts at Plymouth, and by a strange perversion of taste, the inhabitants of Plymouth would ride over to this inconvenient theatre to see a play, when their own palace, with the same attraction, would be utterly deserted.

In Plymouth and Dock we passed four months very agreeably, Osbaldistone alone contriving to make himself and others as uncomfortable as possible. Fortunately, his power to do injury was very limited, and finally rested entirely upon his own shoulders.

It was in Plymouth I received the first offer of a London engagement, from no less a personage than

MR. ROBERT ALLISTON,

the Napoleon of the drama, of whom it has been justly said, if thrown overboard, in rage, from one side of a ship, he would before his tormentors could turn round, upon the other side of the deck appear as a gentleman, ready to begin the world again; who, as manager of a minor theatre, led the town captive, daily infringing the rights of the patentees of the Royal Theatre, with impunity, and who as lessee of a patented theatre, forthwith brought civil actions against the minor theatres infringing his rights; the favourite of the people by whom he was spoiled; honoured by the smiles of royalty, until on one occasion at least, he actually imagined himself a king—in representing the character of George the Fourth, in the pageant of the coronation responding to the applause of his audience by the emphatic phrase of "Bless you, my people."

One of the best actors on the London stage, decidedly in talent, of whom I was surrounded, crowning his play of the Iron Mask with that success, which has made it keep possession of the stage, by his excellent acting in a part in which John Kemble, with all his popularity, had failed, although written expressly for him by Colman the younger—whose merry laugh and quizzical expression of tenance in comedy, would force a stone to laugh with him; whose known powers of guiding the unruly passions of the offended audience, has never been equalled by manager or actor; whom no one could resist without being persuaded, against his inclination and his will, that he was wrong. His well authenticated anecdotes of the stage would fill a volume, from the perusal of which no one would rise fatigued.

And from such a man, for which I was indebted to Mr. Munden not to be slighted, or an opening at Drury Lane Theatre, of which he was lessee, thrown aside without due deliberation. The great desideratum of my hopes and desires was within my reach; once lost, the opportunity might not readily occur again; I therefore resigned into the hands of the Manager Dawson all my right and the occupation of the theatres at Plymouth, Dock, Liskeard, Bodmin, Penzance, Truro, and Falmouth, laid down the managerial truncheon, and departed for London full of anticipated honours. On my arrival I found the situation for which my services were required, so many degrees below the object my ambition aimed at, that I at once declined it, and not the wish of Mr. Munden, that I should play any character of my own selection for his benefit, which was shortly to take place, could induce me to such a result. I concluded my engagement with him as a member of his country theatres at Coventry, Leamington, Spa, Northampton, &c., &c., where I spent a delightful summer.

Previous to my departure I acted Sponge, in a burlesque. Where I dined, at the Adelphi theatre, for my friend Wilkinson's benefit, in fulfilment of a promise, made when we were together in Lincoln, which I could not recede, so I gave my first bow before a London audience on Monday, April 2nd, 1821. I was loudly applauded throughout the whole of this performance, receiving more than the most liberal offers of engagements before I left the theatre that evening, all of which I refused, having suddenly taken up a whim to visit the United States of America.

At Coventry, where I first played under the banner, I met my old friend Meadows. Mr. S. Penley, of Drury Lane, was the manager, and a more gentlemanly young man, more calculated to consult the good will of a

I played Jaffier in the play, and Carwin in Therese, afterwards.

A dilemma arose out of the question of the termination of the license, the manager construing his right to play sixty nights, when and how he pleased, during one calendar year, while the magistrates insisted that the sixty nights, to which the license extended, must be played consecutively, excluding only the Sabbath-day, which they contended was the meaning of the Bill of Parliament, and in accordance with this decision closed the Theatre.

The time I acted Mr. Elliston in Coventry, part of Ennui in the Dramatist, on which he pleased me compliment me very highly, and renewed the old to play following season at Drury Lane. However, I could not forget that he had tried to persuade me first interview, that Willoughby in the same play was an appropriate part to make a debut before a London audience. When between the Mr. Elliston, of a country theatre, and a gentleman, lessee of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane. In the former character he was a delightful companion, promoting fun and frolic, joining in it heart and soul, the merriest among the merry, adored by the actors, who, accustomed to this familiarity, on a visit to London, ventured sometimes to address an old companion, but to meet the stern and haughty shoulder, which plainly said, "I am astonished at your impertinence: do you to whom you are speaking? keep your distance—here; I know you not."

During the summer of 1831, place the coronation of George the Fourth, the King of England, a spectacle which brought together the rich, the noble, and the talented, from every quarter of the globe; an event which had not occurred for better than a century before, which was celebrated in a style of gorgeous splendour, recalling the days of chivalry and tournament, the nobility of England vying with representatives of royalty throughout Europe, and eclipsing many of them in extravagant display of unbounded wealth.

This august ceremony was afterwards given in mimic display by Elliston, at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane. The "fac simile" of the original received the approbation of the citizens of London and Westminster, the King himself condescending to visit the theatre, during the representation, of course stamping with fashion. It was, in fact, as perfect as such a representation could possibly be.

The manager having reaped a golden harvest in London, wisely resolved, close of the season, to represent magnificently throughout the provincial theatres, Northampton, to place we were summoned, where, under the direction of Mr. Lee, formerly the stage manager of the Adelphi Theatre, (under Rodwell and J. [redacted])—who has immortalised his name in the annals of theatricals, by his exquisite performance of Muddle, in the balletta of Rochester. [redacted] was produced, [redacted] all the requisite properties and dresses, Mr. B. Penley personating the King; [redacted] Montague Wenley, Prince Leopold; Mr. Wemyss, Lord Castlereagh; the two last named dressed in the full order of the Garter. Every gentleman in the theatre was required to personate not only one, but, in some instances, half a dozen characters. I have only particularised those who, speaking theatrically, could not double, the costliness of their costume, which required at least half an hour to adjust properly, preventing the possibility of a rapid change of dress. The procession, in passing, occupied at least three quarters of an hour.

In Northampton, everything passed off [redacted] with great edit, and is remembered by those who witnessed it, as the most delightful [redacted] representation ever seen. The champion and the procession accompanying the King into the body of the cathedral, passing through the very centre of the audience, had a magical and grand appearance.

[redacted] Northampton we proceeded to Coventry, decidedly [redacted] [redacted] of the most radical towns [redacted] England. Here [redacted] had to endure [redacted] groans and hisses of the audience, as the representatives of those persons politically offensive [redacted] the spectators. The procession was a scene of tumult, each character being received with tumultuous applause, or with hisses, cat-calls, and other deafening noise. I, as Lord Castlereagh, was the first obnoxious [redacted] upon who made his appearance. From the moment I placed my foot upon the stage, until the last page supporting my train disappeared, it was one cry of "Shame! shame!" "Off! off!" "Queen!" "Queen!" "Who sold his country?" "Ha!" "Off!" "Go along!" mingled with hisses and groans. This ceremony generally occupies about two minutes. The Duke of York followed me, and the change from hissing and hooting, to applauding and huzzing, was wonderful. The next who incurred their displeasure were the King's Attorney-General and the Judges. Prince Leopold was favourably received; but for his Majesty, it was reserved to try the strength of the parties. Here the row generally terminated in a fight between his Majesty's loyal subjects and the admirers of the Queen, which lasted until the scene changed to the banquetting-hall. This was repeated on every representation; and when the last night arrived, I felt relieved from the most disagreeable task I ever had imposed upon me during my theatrical [redacted].

We returned to Northampton for the season, and here

Meadows left us, to make his first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre, as Scrub, in the Beau's Stratagem.

In Northampton, I received a letter from Mr. Miller, the agent of Messrs. Warren and Wood, of Philadelphia, so satisfactory, that I abandoned my thoughts of pursuing my education in that quarter any farther, notwithstanding I had London offers, in 1792 to meet [redacted] of my [redacted] Wilkinson, whose strong recommendations in my favour had opened the correspondence.

The Leamington company was now [redacted] the London [redacted] returning to their winter engagements in the metropolis, and [redacted] me [redacted] wandering, my [redacted] whither. Among many good [redacted] happy season introduced me to, I [redacted] not forget the leader of our orchestra, Paddy Day. Many a [redacted] hour was [redacted] by his good fellowship.

Mr. Howard, the manager of the Lancaster circuit, offered me an engagement, at a guinea and a half per week, to join him at Wigan, which I accepted, and once more turned my face towards the north. I opened with him in Tangent, in The Way to Get Married.

My stay with Howard was unusually short. However, the cause of separation was so truly laughable, it deserves to be [redacted]. Having to act Kennure, in the Falls of Clyde—at that time a very popular piece in every country theatre—in the duel scene, in which Kennure's being wounded, and supposed to be dead, turns the rest of the plot of the drama; the pistols missed fire, and were again cocked with no better success. Another pair of pistols [redacted] furnished by the property man; this only added to our difficulty, as mine exploded; but not all the efforts of my adversary could induce his pistol to go off. Now, as I was to be killed and not him, the only option left was to fall without cause, or to lower the curtain and begin the scene again. We adopted the latter course; for which, the manager in anger, made use of expressions both harsh and unnecessary. At last I cut the argument short by saying, "If you please, Mr. Howard, you will accept my six weeks' notice and we will part." "Certainly, sir. You have only been rather too quick for me. I should have proposed the same thing at the close of the performance, for your airs of grandeur are only [redacted] Covent Garden or Drury Lane, and won't do for [redacted] theatre."

During my six weeks' expiation, for an unintentional error, with Howard, I received the following letter from Mr. Miller, which again directed my views to the United States of America:

(CONT.)

— London, 1822.

"DEAR SIR:—

"I am fully authorized to conclude an engagement with you, am inclined to think it would answer both yours and the managers' purpose. My friends, Mr. Wilkinson and Mr. Hughes, speak in high terms of your abilities, and I am confident that their report is correct. Still, if I likely I have the pleasure of seeing you play in or near London within the next few weeks, I should be glad to do so. This, however, shall not stand in the way of an arrangement. Will you be good enough to say what you think of the terms offered to you in September last? If I recollect rightly, I gave you a distinct and detailed account of them. I now turn to Mr. Wood's letter, though I have it on my file, and he does not in his recapitulate them. The new theatre opens on the first of December, so that we have plenty of time. I hope, you will feel assured, that you will make it extremely well worth your purpose. Hoping to hear from you shortly, I remain, dear sir, Yours truly,

"68, Strand.

(Signed)

"JOHN MILLER."

Before the receipt of this letter, I had engaged to play six nights at Kirkham, with the manager of the Kendal theatre, (Mr. Cooper,) at the close of the season in Wigan. It was from Kirkham, therefore, on the 4th of April, 1822, that I finally agreed to the terms offered by the American manager, and began to prepare for my departure. In Chorley, I again met my old friend Jack Esley, reduced to a mere shadow of his former self, surrounded by a house full of noisy children, the complete picture of a strolling actor rapidly sinking into oblivion. I could scarcely believe that any man, possessing superior talent in the profession of his own choice, could have suffered himself to recede so far in the estimation of the public for want of energy—the highest object of his ambition, being a pipe of tobacco and a pot of porter. So long as he could command these without much trouble, he was perfectly satisfied to every thing around him; laughing merrily, as if his pockets were lined with guineas, he was content with this world. He accompanied me as far as Preston, where he shook hands, and parted to me more. "Good bye, Jack." "God bless you, Frank, my boy, and send you love from the herring pond," were the last words we exchanged. He returned to Chorley, and I made the best of my way to Kirkham.

I met Mr. Cooper, who was anxiously expecting my arrival. I opened in Vapid, in the Dramatic. Being named as the star of the company, I was of course received well by the audience. The company was by no means a bad one, consisting of Mr. Cooper, (the manager,) Mr. Robson, Mr. Lardner, Mr. Lardner, jr., Mr. Egerton, Mr. Hall, Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Goddard, Master Stanley, Mrs. Cooper, Mrs.

Lardner, Mrs. Hobson, Mrs. Lardner, jr., and Mrs. Aldin, (formerly Mrs. Stanley, New York Theatre).

From K[ ]ham, I proceeded [ ] to London, to [ ] requisite preparations for the voyage, which [ ] to commence a new era in my theatrical life. In the year 1823, it [ ] a difficult matter to induce an actor to cross the Atlantic; [ ] even Mr. Miller, the agent of Warren and Wood, told [ ] could scarcely calculate upon my departure until he saw me on board [ ] the packet, although I assured him, that having pledged my word, [ ] offer on this side of the Atlantic could induce [ ] to stay, although they might expedite my return. Offer [ ] offer was made, and many urged [ ] to rudeness, but without being able to shake my resolution—until it became [ ] standing joke among those actors with whom I was upon [ ] of friendship, to [ ] whenever they [ ] me, "Well, Wemyss, when do you retire into banishment?"

CHAPTER VIII.

Expectations of America. Windsor Theatre. Last Engagement in [ ] land. Captain Sherburne, and the Ship Robert Edwards. Departure [ ] England. Arrival at New York. Yellow Fever. Park Theatre. Journey to Philadelphia. First Impression of the Quaker City. The New Theatre in Chestnut Street. Introduction to Messrs. Warren and Wood.

HAVING determined to cross the Atlantic, my first care was [ ] provide myself with a new stage wardrobe, determined, if I failed in the United States of America, that it should not be for want of exertion on my own part. I expended on my outfit, three hundred pounds sterling, adding such of the dresses I then possessed, which I deemed sufficiently handsome. A better wardrobe, [ ] of more general utility, no actor [ ] commenced an engagement with. Yet I was [ ] buoyed up with any extravagant ideas of brilliant success; my plain calculation was, having been considered a respectable actor in [ ] country, surrounded by competitors of every grade, I have [ ] right to expect I may be considered something [ ] than respectable [ ] America, where numbers prevail not: and such aid [ ] external ornament could bestow, I [ ] resolved to have.

What could induce Mr. Wood to send to England for a light comedian, while he was himself sustaining all the principal parts, and in high estimation as [ ] actor, with the public, I am [ ] a loss to conjecture. Had I been in possession of that secret before my departure, [ ] [ ] I have left England on such a Quixotic expedition. Expecting to and a clear field for exertion, which I was promised, I was willing to make the attempt; but to sail three thousand miles to oppose an established favourite, was an idea that never entered into my calculation, and which, I can assure you, I never have abandoned my prospects in England, which appeared most favourable, during my American negotiation.

Fate ordained it otherwise; and many a bitter hour of regret I experienced during the first year of my absence, of which I shall speak in its proper place.

Surrounded by offers on all sides, I accepted an engagement for six weeks, from Mr. Smith, the manager of the Windsor Theatre, whom I should superintend my preparations, and attend to my theatrical duties at the same time. This was the first theatre I acted in, in England.

During the season at Windsor I met with an accident, which had nearly kept me in England against my will, and in face of all my declarations. In acting Corinthian Tom, in the Burletta of Tom and Jerry, I had one of my knees so twisted, as to render it doubtful whether I should be able to act for months; however, I was determined it should be no trial which should prevent the fulfilment of my engagement, which I subjoin.

"DEAR SIR,

"I am favoured with your letter, dated 1st of May, and agree, without hesitation, on the part of the proprietors of the Philadelphia Theatre, (Messrs. Warren and Wood,) to secure to you an engagement for three years, at a salary of six guineas per week, with the accustomed benefits and advantages, on your engaging to play the light comedy of the theatre, and being with Messrs. Wood and Warren by the first of December, 1822, the time fixed for opening their new theatre. Should you require a more formal and detailed agreement previous to your sailing, I engage to have it prepared and witnessed.

"I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

(Signed)

"JAMES MILLER,
(Agent to the Theatre.)

"69, Fleet-street, London. May 2nd, 1822."

Every thing being ready for my departure, I secured a passage in the ship Robert Edwards, from London to New York, there being no vessel in port whose destination was Philadelphia. My baggage was placed on board, and I started for Portsmouth, to join the ship on her departure from the Isle of Wight.

On the 26th of September, 1822, I placed my foot upon her deck, where Captain Sherburne welcomed me on board, and on the following day, with a fair wind, we tripped our anchor, and I bade adieu to my native land.

We had a very agreeable, although a very long passage, arriving at New York on Saturday, the 16th of November. On reaching Sandy Hook, the first intelligence we [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] very flattering to a foreigner; it was simply this—"Gentlemen, I think you [redacted] better not venture [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] city, the yellow fever rages there very badly."

What a delightful reception, after a long voyage; however, [redacted] did go up to the city, and without any evil effects, although [redacted] populous city of New York looked like a deserted village.
[redacted] gloomy impression made on my first approach has never been totally obliterated; the words "infected district" will [redacted] whenever I think of my arrival. I slept the first night at [redacted] Courtland House; but by the recommendation of Capt.
Sherburne, removed the following morning to Niblo's Hotel, corner of William and [redacted] street, where I remained until my departure for Philadelphia.

On Saturday evening, myself [redacted] fellow passengers [redacted] the Park Theatre, to [redacted] Matthews play Dr. Ollapod, in [redacted] Poor Gentleman. [redacted] house was not crowded, and the play very indifferently acted, giving me a most unfavourable impression of the [redacted]. It was certainly the [redacted] company I [redacted] [redacted] seen in a metropolitan theatre.

After the performance, I met my old friend Joe Cowell, who was attached to the theatre, having arrived in America only a [redacted] months before me. He afterwards became very popular, both in New York and Philadelphia.

In his company I wandered through the streets of New York, visiting such places as he pointed out to me, and feeling [redacted] only those can feel who, in a foreign country, meet a friend whom they know takes [redacted] interest in their welfare, relieving the horrible knowledge of being alone among multitudes.

On Saturday, the 23rd of November, 1822, I took [redacted] departure from New York for Philadelphia, and by [redacted] [redacted] accountable mistake got on board the wrong steamboat, so that, instead of proceeding to New Brunswick, I found myself with all [redacted] heavy baggage landed [redacted] Elizabethtown Point, with the prospect of remaining until Monday, or proceeding by a private conveyance to Trenton by land, and [redacted] endeavour [redacted] reach the [redacted] before her departure from that place. I therefore hired a dearborn [redacted] convey me thither. At New Brunswick, the negro who drove informed [redacted] that one [redacted] horses [redacted] [redacted] same, it would be impossible to proceed before [redacted] morning. I ordered [redacted] to hire another, with which we proceeded to Kingston, where I arrived at two o'clock [redacted] Sunday morning; and finding [redacted] impossible to reach Trenton in time for the boat, I resolved [redacted] remain. This was the [redacted] country inn I had seen in America; it is on the top of a hill, on [redacted] left hand [redacted] of [redacted] [redacted] coming from New York—by whom kept I am ignorant [redacted] [redacted] day—but [redacted] was way-faring passengers better treated; everything was as clean and comfortable as it was possible to be. I have seen a great many inns in my time, good, bad, and indifferent, but never enjoyed myself more than on the present occasion.

I slept soundly until ten o'clock, when I ordered breakfast, and an excellent one it was; despatched the driver home, who had driven me from Elizabethtown; concluded a bargain with the landlord, to convey me and my baggage to Philadelphia that day, in an extra stage—so that I may say, I arrived in my carriage and tour in that city, on Sunday evening, 11th of November,—this journey from New York having cost me nearly fifty dollars.

At Judd's Hotel, in Third street, (now Congress Hall) where I alighted, quite an animated scene met my view; the house was crowded in every part, travellers flocking from all quarters to witness the great race at Washington City, between Sir Charles and Eclipse, which ended in disappointment. This scene, from its novelty, was most agreeable to a stranger; and although I had travelled over some very bad roads—that is, bad by comparison, for our English roads being so good, made the contrast more forcible; I had reached my destination in time for the fulfilment of all my engagements.

My first impressions of Philadelphia were most favourable. There was something in the bustle of the hotel, which pleased me; the rush to the dinner table on the sound of the bell; the rapidity with which the ample provision disappeared from the table, really amused me. During my first dinner at Judd's Hotel, I shall record a circumstance at which I have laughed at least a hundred times, in presence of the gentleman who caused my surprise. A high-minded and honourable young man, from the State of Georgia, having indulged in potations deep of champagne, (which, bye-the-bye, at American tables flows as freely as water,) was involved in some wordy quarrel at the upper end of the table, which he suddenly terminated by rolling an apple with some force the full length of the table, exclaiming at the same time, if anybody wanted to fight, he has only to bring me that apple. There must have been from forty to fifty people seated in different knots, of four and five in each party, who only laughed at the sudden ebullition of feeling; nor would I have noted the occurrence, but to shame the host of travellers who, passing through America with railroad speed, retail these anecdotes as illustrative of the general character of the Americans; all though in what they term the polite and polished circles of Paris and London, isolated cases, far more disgraceful than the present, occur daily without producing any remarks, excepting from the party where the breach of good manners occurs.

I came to America with all the prejudices of an Englishman,—have involved myself in many scrapes in defence of England, which I never hear assailed without defending; but I have lived for upwards of twenty years among the Americans, and I do not think any inducement could prevail upon me, permanently to take up my abode in my native country; yet it does not seem that I should sit quietly by and hear England reviled for those very qualities which form the boast of a native American—namely: love for the land of their birth. And never do I hear an Englishman loudly denouncing his native land, that I do not quickly repeat the lines of my poet:

“————— For be it understood,
He left his country for his country's good.”—ARMS!

But to return to Philadelphia—the cleanliness of its streets, their uniformity, the hurry of business at this time decidedly in her favour, as compared to the lengthened viages of the citizens of New York just emerging from the scourge of the yellow fever, formed a pleasing contrast, reviving my spirit.

The most striking object was the Bank of the United States, built in a prominent situation in Chestnut street, and in a very chaste style of architecture; the Supreme House, from whose halls the President of the United States, which severed from the English Crown, the brightest gem in her colonial possessions; the Museum, in the same building; the Academy of Fine Arts—all in Chestnut street—and last, the New Theatre then building in the same street, all viewed with different feelings of interest.

The language spoken by all around me, the nasal twang with which it was pronounced, alone revealing the fact that I was not in England, but making me feel a stranger in what I might otherwise have conceived to be the land of my fathers, spoke to the feelings of the heart, pronouncing me to be a foreigner.

I waited upon Mr. Warren at his house in Sansom street, leaving my card and a letter from his agent, Mr. Miller. He called at the hotel in the course of the day, and appointed the following morning, (Tuesday, the 28th of November,) to meet him at the theatre, where he would introduce me to his partner, Mr. Wood, to whom I wished to talk a little matter of business, and most hospitably invited me to spend the evening in his society.

I was very much pleased with the appearance of the Chestnut Street Theatre, then nearly completed; its only eyesore in my estimation, being the chandelier suspended from the dome, which by others, was considered its greatest beauty; but the fate of the Exeter Theatre immediately occurred to my mind; and another objection to this mode of lighting the theatre, is, that it exposes in the most very portion which he kept as much as possible the shade, which has contributed to the downfall of the drama, than put together; I allude to the third tier of boxes, where licentiousness prevails in its worst form.

I introduced to Mr. Wood, with whose urbanity and apparent kindness I was more than pleased, and distinctly saying, among other foolish things in his praise, that he was the most perfect gentleman I had ever in the profession. As regards outward appearance, I have to alter my opinion; but if his conduct towards me, stripped of specious manners, were to form his claim to that character, he must not choose me as his biographer; yet I may well afford to forgive all his transgressions, in that he provided me with a wife. Had he kept me engaged in professional duty, in all probability I should never have thought of marrying; and in this important event of a life, I, at least, never can regret my visit to America.

CHAPTER IX.

Opening of the Theatre. List of the Company. Cooper. First Appearance in America. Reception. Newspaper Criticisms. His Address in Baltimore. Audience. Evening Parties. Marriage. Tom Jerry. Stephen Price. First Appearance in Washington City. Philadelphia. Season of 1823 and 1824.

THE Theatre opened on Monday, the 2d of December, 1822, a address, written, as the play-bills informed me, by Mr. Sprague, of Boston, and well delivered by Mr. Wood. The play was School for Scandal, which was admirably acted—Warren playing Sir Peter Teazle; Wood, Charles Surface; H. Wallack, Joseph Surface; Jefferson, Crabtree; Francis, Sir Oliver Surface; T. Jefferson, Sir Benjamin Backbite; Hathwell, Rowley; Burke, Moses; Darley, Careless; John Jefferson, P; Green, Snake; Mrs. Wood, Lady Teazle; Mrs. La Folle, Lady Sneerwell; Mrs. Francis, Mrs. Candour; and Mrs. H. Wallack, Maria.

Mrs. Wood was the only person in the play with whom I was not perfectly satisfied; although I afterwards became one of that lady's warmest admirers. As an actress, in smooth, level speaking, she had no equal on the American stage; but she must forgive me for saying, I think her sister, Mrs. Darley, would have been a much better representative of Lady Teazle.

This comedy was followed by the melo-drama of the dering Boys, which was also very well performed, but did not give me an exalted opinion of the talent of the artists, the scenery being decidedly bad, and entirely out of keeping.

The manner in which these pieces were acted, convinced me I had a harder task before me, to insure success, than I had hitherto imagined myself to suppose. The members of the Philadelphia company were veteran actors, who understood their profession, and whose exertions were duly appreciated by a discriminating audience. They consisted of—Messrs. Warren, Mr. Wood, the managers; Mr. Henry Wallack, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Burke, Mr. Francis, Mr. Wilson, Mr. T. Jefferson, Mr. J. Jefferson, Mr. D. Johnston, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Green, Mr. Wheatley, Mr. Hathwell, Mr. Parker, Mr. Bignall, Mr. Murray, Mr. Andes, Mr. Scrivener, Mr. Lopez, the prompter; Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Darley, Mrs. Entwistle, Mrs. H. Wallack, Mrs. La Folle, Mrs. Burke, Mrs. Francis, Mrs. Jefferson, Mrs. Anderson, Mrs. Simpson, Mrs. Green, Mrs. May, Mr. Hathwell, Mr. Parker, Miss L. Hathwell, Miss H. Hathwell; to whom was now to be added, Mr. Wemyss, before the end of the season, Mr. and Mrs. Montoyer and their family.

With such an array of talent, every part was filled by an actor fully competent to sustain the reputation of the theatre; and the unfavourable opinion I had formed of the state of the Drama, from the first play I witnessed in the city of New York, was converted into a feeling of gratification, at the regular appearance of this theatre was

It was agreed upon by Mr. Wood and myself, that I should make my first appearance in Vapid, in the Dramatist; I followed by Marplot, in the Busy Body; Mr. Rover, in Wild Oats, but we might alter upon. I stipulated for three parts, at the opening of my engagement, to secure a fair hearing, and avail myself of the opportunity to make, if possible, a favourable impression upon the audience. Had I supposed that my first part would have been the Dramatist, I should have selected Marplot, which was decidedly my best effort, and which I purposely reserved, either to follow up a successful debut, or to retrieve lost ground, which I knew I would do, in case of failure. But my manager had determined I should not succeed, before I placed my foot upon the American stage—that is, if he could, by any means, prevent it.

The first object of curiosity to me in the theatre was the announcement of

MR. WILLIAM COOPER,

a name bright in the annals of theatrical fame—at one time the pride and glory of the American stage—who drew more money from the public, and drawn more into the treasury of the theatre, than any actor of the present day—whose name, the head of the play bills, the glory of a well-filled house whose style of declamation he held up as worthy of imitation, both by the pulpit and the bar—who has, in most inclement weather, travelled a hundred miles a day, roads almost impassable—playing on the nights, in the cities of New York and Philadelphia, to delighted audiences, until he was denominated “the flying actor”—his haughty demeanour and rudeness, amounting to his brother actors, rendered him an object of fear

As an actor in the vigour of his fame, he must be one of the best of the American school. It was not good fortune to see him until he was in the wane; but even then, his performance of Damon, in Damon and Pythias, was a masterpiece of art, which all who perform the part on the American stage—from Mr. E. Forrest to those of humble pretensions, have imitated as closely as possible. Carrying his energy to the verge of caricature, who, that has seen Mr. Cooper in the part, can forget the scene in which he receives from Lucullus the intimation of the death of his horse, upon whose swiftness of foot depended the safety of his friend, perilled by this act; the perfect stupor which his whole frame, suddenly seized by the picture of the blood of Pythias flowing for him; his resolution to sacrifice on the instant both himself and his slave, who, his affection for his master, wrought the ruin of his honour. Nothing on the stage—not even the third act of Othello, by Keen—ever surpassed it. It was painfully true to nature, equalled only by his delirious joy when he arrives just in time to save his friend, and by his efforts at the foot of the scaffold,—receiving, amidst the tumultuous applause, the tears of the audience,—the conception of a master-mind. For my own part, after witnessing it, I always wished to leave the theatre, that nothing might break the charm for the evening.

What a pity it is that great actors should remain upon the stage after they have outlived their reputation: yet how few retire until old age has impaired their faculties, that respect for what they have been, attracts an audience from open professions, the people contemned and despised, frequently is, and of recording to posterity the triumph of his art; therefore, the recollection of his taste and beauty should be at least preserved intact by the generation in which he flourishes.

And here let me ask, why an actor should not receive the society the honours to talent! The physician, the barrister, the clergyman, the soldier, are received with the honour due to their occupation. The player, whose toil is equal, and whose task to gain eminence is more severe, is only received as a clever buffoon, tolerated, but not accepted of the society. It is true, the Kemble family form an exception to the general rule of exclusion; but even they held their position upon suffrance, not upon right.

On the 6th of December, I first saw Mr. Cooper act Virginus, which, in my opinion, was a play so mutilated, that with difficulty I recognise Knowles' Tragedy—a liberty no manager or actor should take, and which contained indelicate language or allusion, which mar any work. It matters not who the author may be; the more celebrated the more disgraceful the outrage: but for caprice, to mangle the work of an absent author, is, say the least of it, a most unfair proceeding.

It was not until I saw Mr. Cooper play Damon that I would admit his claim to rank as an actor of the highest merit, notwithstanding his popularity; but after that performance, it required but little rhetoric to persuade me he was capable of any effort which could be required from a man of feeling that the reputation he enjoyed was justly merited.

Wednesday, the 11th of December, I made my first appearance in America, as Vapid, in the Fortune. I was a fortunate fellow, on the first night before a strange audience, and on this occasion, the most important to me in my theatrical life, Dame Fortune was not inclined to let me off with some annoy and disturb.

At the first of the second act, the house was suddenly filled with smoke, inducing a belief that the theatre was on fire, which caused a simultaneous movement of alarm towards the doors, until Mr. Wood stepped forward and explained from whence the smoke proceeded. This satisfied the audience, who resumed their seats; but such an incident in a first appearance in a foreign country, of whose manners I was totally ignorant, was calculated to shake firmer than mine.

However, all progressed smoothly enough, and the scene between Lord Scratch, Lady Waitford, and Vapid, behind the sofa, was received with both applause and genuine laughter, and Mr. Warren's excellent acting as Lord Scratch, aided very much in producing, and I left the stage with the applause of the audience ringing most gratefully in my ears.

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

was in the fourth act that the approbation of the audience became so decided, that by the advice of Mr. Warren, and elated by my own feelings, I agreed to speak the Epilogue, which I had declined in the morning. I had to regret this conclusion, as, passing through the ordeal of a five after-act play, a gentleman in the boxes, favoured me with a smart hint, (for pronouncing, as he said, the word girl like gal.) It was instantly drowned in applause; but it gave to Mr. Wood the plea, at which he took such ungenerous advantage, to declare to Mr. Miller that I was obnoxious to the audience. The fact, I have no wish to conceal; it was the first and last hint ever directed at me on the Philadelphia stage for years. Of the next, I shall have occasion to speak more in detail; the circumstance is well known to every frequenter of the theatre, and the uproar it created had nearly been productive of serious consequences to others beside myself.

I had no reason to complain of my reception. Mr. Warren congratulated me upon my success, and Francis who had witnessed the whole performance, assured me it was satisfactory to the audience. One thing is certain, whatever may have been the opinion of the public on the present occasion, I was a better actor when I first played in Philadelphia, than I ever esteemed myself at a later period of my life, when established as an acknowledged favourite in the Chestnut Street Theatre. That the performance of Vapid could not have been very bad, the proof is, that unknown to a single individual out of the theatre, it should have been received with sufficient approbation to call forth the congratulations of one of the managers who had sustained a principal part in the play. I will dwell no further upon it than to add the opinion of the press on the same character, on the 11th of December, 1822; and on the 12th of April, 1826, during the whole of which period I was a member of the theatre, containing the best stock company ever assembled within its walls.

From the Philadelphia Gazette, Dec. 12, 1822.

"New Theatre.—The house was very respectfully attended last evening, to the performance of 'The Dramatist, or Stop him who Can.' The only novelty presented in the dramatic personae consisted of a Mr. Wemyss, who made his first appearance in the character of Vapid. The report had spoken in golden terms of his theatrical acquirements. That he possesses a great degree of merit as a young performer, will not be denied; but it is equally manifest, from his last night's representation, that study, experience and practice, are to be superadded to his natural accomplishments, before he can expect to tread the stage with great credit to himself.

"He appears to possess a great flow of the feeling, and an elasticity of which, prudently nurtured, may in a few years make him respectable in the light and sedate walks of the stage.

"His voice did not appear to have attained its proper pitch. This may be obviated when he becomes more familiar with the house. Upon the whole, with a suitable degree of application, we consider he may become an acquisition of no inconsiderable value to our theatre.

From the United States Gazette, April 15, 1836.

" * * * Vapid the Dramatist, was written for Lewis, as indeed, [him], the principal character in each of his (Reynolds') comedies; and it is said, the author, in drawing the portrait, set for himself. Supported as it was by Mr. Wemyss, Mr. Reynolds could not have wished for a better representative; if we are not mistaken, this gentleman made his first appearance in this city in the same part. We well remember, however, of witnessing his enaction of Vapid about four years ago; but the gratification we then experienced was considerably augmented by the improvement we discovered in the performance of it this evening. Whatever might have been the estimation of Mr. Lewis, we feel convinced that Mr. Wemyss could not lose by comparison with him, were he now alive: he may be allowed to place himself upon and consider it as a chief d'œuvre. * * * We cannot forbear mentioning the two scenes where Mr. Wemyss showed to so much advantage, that no one who saw him could refrain from expressing their approbation of his excellence. [ ] first and [ ] scene in the [ ] act, when starting from his concealment behind the sofa, [ ] exclaimed—"Prologue or Epilogue?"—"I'm the man?"—"I'll write you both." To [ ] the expression [ ] countenance, his situation, the statement, not unmingled with horror of Lord Scratch, and the confusion of Lady Watford, would be a subject fit for Hogarth, and the last scene of the fourth act. There were other parts where he was admirable; but we may not stop to enumerate them, dismissing him by observing it was a finished performance."

"[ ] opinions were written, the first [ ] I [ ] perfectly unknown, and the last when I was surrounded by friends and needed not the encomium of the press to designate my position with the audience. It is scarcely possible, taking into consideration I was an actor of eight years' standing and repute before I came to the United States, that in four years after my arrival, there should have been so marked a difference in the performance of the same part, as to entitle me to such lavish praise, unless I had deserved a little more than I received at the hands of the first critic, considering also that I did not act the part more than four or five times between the first and last representation.

From the 11th of December until the 18th, my name was not mentioned in the play bills. On the following Wednesday, I was announced for Hovey, in "[ ] Oats," Mr. Cooper having played on all the intervening nights. This was giving a stranger a fair field with a vengeance; and I had discovered the secret,—a most disagreeable one to me,—that no light comedian was wanted; but a walking gentleman was the only department in _____ an excellent company was deficient, and which I determined should never be filled by me.

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

Although my third appearance should have been in the play of the Bury Body, as Marplot, I found myself _____ on the 21st of December, for Doucourt, and I heard no more of the play of the Bury Body, for many months, _____ I agreed _____ Sir George Airy, to Mr. Wood's Marplot, which I _____ a favourite character of the manager.

_____ the characters in the varied round of the drama, _____ a comedian may be called upon _____ Doucourt, in the _____ Stratagem, is decidedly _____ an _____ firmly rooted in the good opinion of _____ audience, _____ necessity of extravagance in the _____ the fear of carrying that extravagance _____ far, in a _____ actor and his audience _____ strangers _____ other, _____ former in a most delicate situation; _____ was selected by Mr. Wood for my third appearance. Fortunately, the excellent tuition of Mr. Macready, in Bristol, had _____ perfectly conversant with the business of the play, _____ enabled _____ to escape on this occasion the censure of the audience, and even to carry off _____ small share of approbation.

On the 28th, I again appeared as Colonel Freelove, in the Day after the Wedding, to the lady Elizabeth of Mrs. Tatnell, _____ of _____ little repute, but by no means equal either _____ Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Darley, or Mrs. Rutwisle; but it was on the 28th I had to perform the most difficult task yet placed before me. A stranger in the city of Philadelphia, in the fifth part I played _____ entirely new to me, the words of which I had to commit _____ memory, and to appear before the public, in _____ Wood's _____ popular characters, without the audience being apprised of the fact that it _____ a first attempt. _____ was Prince Hal, in Shakespeare's play of Henry the Fourth. Cooper played Hotspur, _____ Warren, Falstaff. I endeavoured _____ avoid this, in vain; Mr. Wood _____ peremptory, and it _____ business _____ obey. I can at _____ say, I was perfect in the language, but _____ a most execrable exhibition, and the applause I received was most undeserved.

On the 1st of July, 1833, I played _____ Gayvelt, _____ Colman's play _____ the Law _____ Java, which, although well got up, was _____ failure, being played twice, and consigned to the "Tomb of Capulets," notwithstanding _____ had the aid of Henry Wallack, Jefferson, and Warren, in the principal characters, and the music very well sung, _____ by Mrs. Burke, at that time the principal female vocalist in the United States, and _____ universal favourite, _____ by the other _____ and gentlemen of the theatre.

On the 17th of January, Mr. James Wallock made his first appearance in the _____ theatre as Holla, in Pizarro, _____ character so decidedly his own, that competition was sure defeat: he was at that time very popular, or I should rather say, attractive. His popularity was diminished, but his attraction not from frequent repetition of the same characters. As a manager, he was the best qualified who ever managed the affairs of an American theatre, and the termination of his career, by the burning of the National Theatre in New York, retrograde his progress twenty years at least, to the just taste for theatrical arrangements, which his judicious arrangements in every department was restoring.

He was not only popular as an actor, but as a man; and his address to the audience at the Holiday Street Theatre, in Baltimore, in the year 1835, was a just and manly rebuke, to that ridiculous custom of calling for a favourite performer at the close of every engagement, to return thanks for patronage received, in a failing engagement. I give it as copied from the "Vade Mecum," of the 1st of October, from his own more papers.

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—I am before you at your call. I am unaccustomed to extemporaneous speaking; but however reluctant I may usually be to address a public audience, I am, on this occasion, that I never experience embarrassment on the present occasion. I am but a plain man, and speak words of truth, notwithstanding my profession leads me to assume the garb of fiction. If I were to tell you that I leave Baltimore gratified, I should tell you a lie—for, the night I have played in this city, this is the only audience I have had the pleasure of witnessing, and you have sincere thanks for honouring my name by your appearance this evening. I am aware of the duties—of the importance to you than my poor services—that have prevented your honouring me with your attendance, which, otherwise, if I may be allowed to judge by the audience I have received in other cities, would, I doubt not, have been more general. I therefore repeat, I thank you kindly for doing me the honour you have, by appearing here to-night; and, with the hope that when I may come among you again, I shall at least occasionally see such an audience as the one before I bid you farewell."

Mr. Wallack acted six nights by himself, and afterwards appeared with Mr. Cooper, in Venice Preserved, Douglas, Othello, Julius Caesar, King John, and Rule a Wife Have a Wife, when he took his departure for the season, and shortly after returned to England.

On the 15th of February, I had the pleasure of shaking hands with Mr. Booth, who was announced to appear as Richard the Third, on the 17th. Always eccentric in his movements, he suddenly left England, and the place of his destination being known, and made his first appearance in America, in Richmond, Virginia—thus losing the aid of the press, in the eastern cities, in promulgating his arrival and preparing the audience for the reception of a really great actor. Where he passed his time, previous to Kean's first visit, is unknown; but he lost the opportunity of first impression, by his delay, and had again, in the New World, to combat the charge of imitation—whereas, by using common prudence, he might have turned the similarity of size and style of acting between Mr. Kean and himself to such advantage, before an American audience, (by securing that judgment in his favour which he subsequently obtained,) as to have made him a formidable rival to the great master of his art, on his first appearance in the United States.

Unheralded as he was, with the recollection of Kean fresh on the minds of the audience, his first appearance in Philadelphia was a failure. The house was indifferently attended. Although the judgment of the few was in his favour, the million could not, at that time, be persuaded to see him. After a few nights' performance, the engagement was postponed until after the appearance of

MR. CHARLES MATTHEWS.

A more honourable or honoured name is not to be found in the catalogue of dramatic worth than the eccentric individual here named. A man, of whom the stage may justly feel proud—irreproachable in his private character, a giant in professional talent, Atlas-like, supporting, on his own shoulders, the burden of entertaining an audience throughout the evening—it will scarcely be credited, that he was permitted to retire from the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, because his talents were considered too limited, being esteemed only as a mimic, not an actor. But, if his Sir Fretful Plagiary, in the Critic, and Morbleu, in Monsieur Tomson, be not considered acting of the highest grade, I have yet to learn what acting consists of.

His assumption of character in his monologues, proved to the managers, when too late, the treasure they had lost.

By his own exertions he succeeded in filling the English opera house, night after night, with the élite of London; acquiring independence, and being perfectly independent of managers or actors, although always "At Home."

A more nervous, irritable, fretful creature, never trod the stage. Inattention or loud talking by the audience would at any time overthrow his best exertions, and render him not only uncomfortable but really unhappy.

In social intercourse he was a delightful companion, in-spring all around him with his own hilarity; the life and spirit of any party of which he was a member. Those who have been amused by his droll caricatures upon the stage may form a slight idea of his power to add to the pleasure of a convivial party. But even here he would brook no rival: "aut Caesar, aut nullus," appears to have been his motto both on and off the stage. If any one attempted to share with him the task of moving the risible faculties of his guests or companions, Matthews would yield at once the contest and become a silent observer.

In decision, it has been said, he was after all only a mimic. Now, in what does acting consist but the power of mimicry? The rapid changes of face, of voice, of manner, which Matthews possessed in a pre-eminent degree, are the very claims of a comic actor to public favour, without which he can never hope to succeed. Then shame upon such slander, which had its origin in professional pique. Mr. Matthews was one of the best comedians belonging to the British stage—gain say it who may.

He made his first appearance on the Philadelphia stage, in the characters of Goldfinch and Morbleau, on the 24th of February, 1823, playing a round of dramatic characters to the delight of crowded houses, before he favoured the audience with his "Trip to Paris," "Country Cousins," "Mail Coach Adventure," and his "Youthful Days." His benefit was the most crowded house I ever witnessed in the Chestnut-street Theatre.

A misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Wood to Mr. Price, manager of the Park Theatre, New York, respecting the character of Tom King, procured me an introduction to the private circle of Mr. Matthews' friends, which rendered me his most intimate acquaintance during his residence in Philadelphia; Mr. Warren, Mr. Burke and myself, being the only actors present at the delightful dinner parties which took place at Mr. Head's, in Washington Square.

I afterwards partook of his hospitality at his cottage, near London, when he appeared much annoyed and hurt at the manner in which his "Trip to America" had been spoken of on this side of the Atlantic, declaring his resolution to visit the United States again, for the purpose of presenting it to the American public. This he carried into effect; and the ungenerous reception he met, although partially healed by acts of subsequent kindness, sunk deeply into his heart, and hurried him into the grave, lamented by all his brother actors.

Booth returned to finish his engagement after the departure of Mr. Matthews; but the result was the same. The reason assigned for not visiting the theatre when he acted before was, every body was waiting to see Matthews. Now, every body had spent the money appropriated to amusement, and were tired of the theatre; Matthews had gone, and the theatre was no longer a place of fashionable resort.

It was not until Booth played Hamlet, for the benefit of the Greek Fund, when he appeared before a large and fashionable audience, that he began to be appreciated, and steadily increased in popularity, until he became the greatest favourite in certain characters belonging to the American stage. He purchased a house in Maryland, near Baltimore, where, in which and his profession he was steadily employed—during the day selling produce in the market, and at night performing the hero of one of Shakespeare's tragedies at the Holiday-street Theatre.

Mr. Wood having quietly disposed of my pretensions, by good-naturedly placing me upon the shelf—a term my theatrical readers will perfectly understand—to be used when and how he pleased, I had so much time upon my hands, that for want of better employment I began to make love, remembering that a celebrated author had said, "whenever Cupid or fears perplex a man, the form of woman strikes upon his troubled spirit, like the rainbow stealing from the clouds, the type of beauty and the sign of hope." Rolando, in the Honey Moon, I resolved to marry; and on the 10th of April, 1823, I was united to Miss Strombeck, the youngest daughter of the late worthy Sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia. "How dost thou, Benedict, the married Man."

Tom and Jerry, or Life in London, was produced in Philadelphia, on the 15th of April; and to the success of this compound of flash and folly, which turned for a time the heads of the play-going community, both in England and America, am I indebted for the favour with which I was henceforward received by the public. Corinthian Tom was the first play in which I had an opportunity of displaying my extensive wardrobe, of which I devoted myself to the fullest extent. From this complete success which crowned this piece, I nightly gained ground; and ultimately, notwithstanding all obstacles, I reached the object of my wishes, the unqualified approbation of a Philadelphia audience.

The season closed on the 30th of April, with a new play, and Tom and Jerry. What induced the managers to out short a piece which was crowding the house nightly is a mystery, known only to themselves; however, the proprietors of the Circus, at Walnut-street, were indebted to them, for Cowell instantly produced it there, and played it without intermission to the close of his season; so that Warren and Wood created a desire to see Tom and Jerry, for the benefit, not of themselves, but of Messrs. Price and Simpson, who reaped a golden har-vent, while we were playing to miserable houses in the city of Baltimore.

Before bidding adieu to my first season in Philadelphia, Mr. Price made me an offer for New York, which my engagement with Warren and Wood did not permit me to accept.

At that time

STEPHEN PRICE

became connected with the stage, I was utterly ignorant; but it was in the year 1823 that the success of Matthews' engagement induced him to form, and carry into execution, the bold idea of farming, if I may be allowed the expression, the talent of those belonging to the London stage, which he thought might be made available in the United States, thus making New-York, Boston, and Baltimore pay for the talents of the English public in New York; acquiring for himself in England the title of "Star Giver General of the United States," and for the Theatre, the reputation of being the "country"—which, until this period, had been claimed, and (judging from the talent of the actors engaged at the two establishments), justly—by the Chestnut-street Theatre of Philadelphia, the critical success of whose audience was the severest test of the English actors had encountered.

Mr. Price's exertions the Americans were indebted for the opportunity of witnessing the performance of Mr. Kean, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Macready, Mr. Conway, Mr. Charles Kemble, Mr. Power, Mr. Wood, Mrs. Wood, Miss Fanny Kemble, Miss Clara Fisher, Madame Vestris, and Mrs. Tree, and a host of other artists of minor importance.

Price was a vivacious, a glorious companion, a bottle of champagne, an excellent friend, a good manager, a man of honour, although a strict disciplinarian.

After directing for years with profit and success the destiny of the theatres in the New World, he carried the war into Africa; and boldly seized the helm of Drury Lane for one season, sustaining himself in London against all the odds that could be brought to bear upon him. But the speculation was eventually ruinous to his fortune, but not his credit: the honourable manner in which he paid the demands of his creditors, with a legal discharge in his pocket, ought to have secured him a better reception from his fellow-citizens than he received in New York, upon his return to his country.

On the 3rd of May, 1823, I left Philadelphia, accompanied by my wife, for the city of Baltimore; and on the Monday following, (the 5th of May,) opened as Vapid, in the Dramatist, at the Holiday-street Theatre. The season was a bad one; no uncommon occurrence in the city of monuments and churches. Notwithstanding the excitement of Tom and Jerry, which was excellently produced, the managers were unable to pay their salaries; and although the actors agreed to receive two-thirds of their nominal amount as payment in full, the managers were unable to keep the theatre open, and we repaired to the city of Washington, where we remained nearly four months, during which time I received but six dollars per week; yet I may say I was perfectly happy. In Baltimore and Washington I spent the early days of a married life—generally the brightest of man's career—therefore, the annoyance of the theatre was forgotten in the comforts of home.

We returned to Baltimore in September; and here it was, while smarting under breach of contract in a foreign country, I received a letter from England, containing the intelligence that Mr. Wood had written a most unfavourable account of my reception in America, condoling with me on the event, and strongly urging my immediate return at my sacrifice.

This led to an angry interview; and a correspondence, which terminated in a sort of compromise, in which the position I was to hold in the theatre was fully defined. I agreed to play many second rate characters, which, by the nature of my contract, I might have refused, but retained the power to reject any which I might deem derogatory.

Here, let me do justice to Mr. Warren, who throughout this early contention, not only openly expressed his dissent to the course Mr. Wood was pursuing, but by his kindness endeavoured to soothe the wounded feelings of professional pride by acts of private hospitality; and to his introduction am I indebted for the acquaintance of many of my best and warmest friends, both in Philadelphia and Baltimore.

The company returned to Philadelphia, after a very unprofitable season in Baltimore, and opened in the former city with the play of Henry the Fourth—Duff sustaining the part of Hotspur, and the Three Singles; Mrs. Battarby, from the Park Theatre, New York, was also added to the company. On the first of January, 1824, the Bride of Abydos was produced,—Mr. Cooper sustaining the part of Selim, and Mrs. Duff the heroine. On the 7th of January, took place the benefit in aid of the Greek Fund; on which occasion Booth played Hamlet before a very crowded audience, who, for the first time, appreciated his talents as an actor. He returned to the city on the 16th of February, to fulfil an engagement which proved profitable to himself and the managers; and from that period he rapidly assumed the position of the best actor belonging to the American stage.

On the 21st of January, Pearson made his first appearance as Count Belus, in the Devil's Bridge; but it was not he played Jocco, in Howard Payne's drama of Chari, that the audience gave him credit for even mediocrity of talent; consequently the houses were not well filled.

De Camp also made his first bow in Philadelphia in the month of January, as Monsieur Merbleu; but the recollection of Matthews was too fresh in the minds of the audience to allow a leaf of the bay, which this part entwined around his brow, to wither, and consequently De Camp was not received with much favour—he was used by the manager as a support to Pearman, but with indifferent success.

On the 12th of March, a tragedy from the pen of James N. Barker, Esq., of Philadelphia, was produced, entitled, Superstition. As this may be termed my first really original part, I will give the cast of the dramatic persons: Sir Reginald Egerton, Warren; George Egerton, Wemyss; Ravenworth, Darley; Walford, Wheatley; Charles, Wood; the Unknown, Duff; Judge, Greene; Villagers, Hathwell, Jones, Bignall; Officers, Johnston, Murray, J. Westmayer; Isabella, Mrs. Wood; Mary, Mrs. Duff; Alice, Mrs. Durang; Lucy, Mrs. Greene. This play was well acted and well received. But Mrs. Duff so far out acted Mrs. Wood, that the manager was careless about repeating a piece which added to the reputation of the former lady, at the expense of his wife, who, although a great favourite, did not happen to "hit" the part of Isabella, while Mrs. Duff made an impression on the audience which rendered her the heroine of the play. It was repeated a few nights afterwards, and then thrown among the MSS. of the library, to be forgotten. I have been surprised, that no manager ever rescued so good a play from oblivion.

On the 30th of March I essayed my first benefit, choosing for the performance the melo-drama of Kenilworth, and the farce of A Roland for an Oliver. I lost by this night about thirty dollars; but many a thirty I afterwards received from the same source to balance the account.

On the 24th of April, a star of no common magnitude appeared in the person of

MR. CONWAY,

a gentleman possessing every personal requisite for an actor, whose unfortunate stature rendered him a victim to the press; and although the cowardly assassin who was known to have stabbed his fame saved his person from the consequences of his baseness by falsehood, disavowing publicly in the green room the authorship of his own writings, yet the high-minded gentleman and scholar, whose wounded feelings could obtain no redress, retired in disgust from the pursuit of the profession to waste his own honour, and to wound the humble prompter, to avoid—what—tell it not in Gath—publish it not in the streets of Ascalon—the ribaldry of a newspaper whose columns were notorious for want of decency, and whose circulation was upheld only by that love for reading scandal against our neighbours inherent in the human race, but from shrink intuitively when levelled at ourselves.

Theodore Hook drove Mr. Conway from the stage, by savage in the John Bull. Mr. Price endeavoured to hold him to the position he felt he ought to hold; but even in America the poisoned shaft had reached him. Although his performance, appreciated his talent; yet to attract anything like a numerous audience, finally burying himself and his sorrows under the waves of the Atlantic, by jumping overboard, on his passage from New York to Charleston, having evidently meditated this suicide, when he put his foot upon the steamboat, which he had resolved should never bear him to the shore. His fate met universal commiseration from those who knew him best, and appreciate the noble qualities of his nature.

made his appearance in Philadelphia, as Hamlet; played an engagement of six nights by himself, and then in conjunction with Mr. Cooper. The theatre closed on the 19th of May, with benefit; Cooper playing Brutus, in Julius Cæsar, and Conway, Marc Antony, in the play, Frank Poppleton, in the farce of Too for Dinner.

During the season of 1823 and 1824, nothing occurred to disturb the harmony of the compromise commenced in Baltimore. I was fortunate enough to obtain Bromley, in Simpson and Co., as an original part, a lucky proved to me, paying the way for the situation I shortly destined to hold in the good-graces of the audience; and so ended my second season in Philadelphia.

CHAPTER X.

Building of the Chatham Theatre, New York. Sudden close of the Chestnut Street Theatre. Offer from New York. First appearance in that City. Enterprise of Barrere. Henry Placide. The Actor a Broker.

It was during the spring of 1824 that Barrere commenced building the Chatham Garden Theatre, in New York, the first of a host that followed, prostrating the drama by the rapid increase of theatres, without audiences to support them; yet I must not be understood as casting censure on the enterprise of Mr. Barrero. What he undertook, he carried through with judgment; collecting a [redacted] worthy of the best days of the drama in the United States, which he placed under the direction of Mr. Kilmer, the manager of the Federal Theatre, in Boston. Among others, he engaged from Philadelphia Theatre, Mr. and Mrs. H. Wallack, Mr. and Mrs. Burke, [redacted] John Jefferson, thus breaking into the summer arrangements of [redacted] Theatre; and by withdrawing [redacted] of [redacted] of [redacted] company, compelling the managers to [redacted] determination of abandoning the [redacted] [redacted] timore, altogether. Thus [redacted] myself out of employment, without [redacted] power of obtaining it, unsanctioned by Messrs. Warren Wood.

of the theatre not admit of my acting during my engagement, was for three y from the December, 1832; but was likely to be red half, by the continued closing of seasons, without urgent necessity for such a course.

A diplomatic correspondence, if I may be allowed the use of such a term, commenced on the 31st of July, between Mr. Wood and myself, (to enable me to accept the offer, made by Messrs. Fisher and Jones, to act a few nights at Vauxhall Gardens, which they offered me ten dollars a night,) the cautious style of which might serve as a model to any prime minister. All I wanted was his permission to do so elsewhere, without infringing existing engagements, which, having obtained, I felt more at my own disposal.

While fulfilling my engagement with Fisher and Jones, I unexpectedly received an offer from Mr. Barrero, to play in the Chatham Theatre, New York, now in the full tide of [redacted]. He offered me the same amount of salary paid [redacted] Mr. George Barrett, (whose place he wished me to supply,) and a benefit before I left, by which [redacted] insured me to make not less than fifty dollars. This proposition I accepted, and made my [redacted] appearance in New York city on the 20th day of September, 1824, as Marplot, in two "Easy Body." My reception was beyond my [redacted] sanguine expectations, and the [redacted] Register thus spoke of it:—"Mrs. Centlivre's comedy of 'Easy Body,' introduced to a New York audience by Mr. Wemyss (formerly of the Philadelphia Theatre,) in [redacted] character of Marplot. He sustained [redacted] part well throughout; [redacted] we may judge from [redacted] applause which he received, gave general satisfaction. [redacted] appeared to have realized the author's idea of a good-natured, silly, and officious person, having no business of his own, and anxious to be acquainted with that of [redacted] body. Mr. Burke personated [redacted] part of Sir Francis Gripe with great effect, and exhibited a true picture of the avaricious, [redacted] deuce, [redacted] particularly [redacted] in the last scene, when he found he had been fooled, and the audience testified their approbation by repeated rounds of applause. The parts of Sir George Airy, by Mr. Wallack, and Miranda, by Mrs. Hughes, were all we could wish."

The result of this performance was an offer from Mr. Barrere of a permanent engagement, which my unlucky contract with the Philadelphia managers prevented the possibility of my accepting, much to the annoyance of Barrere, to whom I admitted I was not comfortably situated in the Philadelphia Theatre, and who could not understand why I should prefer, under such circumstances, to return, when he offered me terms more advantageous than I could have ventured to propose.

No theatre could be conducted with more spirit and enterprise than the Chatham Garden, during its first season. Notwithstanding the strength and talent of the regular company, there was not an actor or actress of talent in the United States, whose services could be procured, who were not engaged to give occasional aid. The plays were excellently acted; and I must acknowledge I left New York with regret, to return to Baltimore, in obedience to the summons of Mr. Wood.

The Baltimore season was commenced and terminated without an occurrence to render it worthy of a passing notice.

We commenced the season in Philadelphia, on the 4th day of December, 1824. And now, chance, for the first time, opened the fair field to me, promised in England, and which I expected to have found on my arrival.

Mr. H. Wallack visited Charleston on a starring excursion; Mr. Duff was confined with gout; Mr. Wood laid up with quincy; and Mr. Wemyss, rightly placed before the audience in the most favourable position, rapidly rose in their estimation.

Misfortunes they say never come singly, so with equal truth may it be observed, one lucky adventure is generally followed by another. While I was becoming hourly a favourite in my profession, I received from home between thirteen and fourteen hundred dollars, the proceeds of about three hundred pounds I had left invested in the British funds; but which the uncertain payment of Messrs. Warren and Wood rendered desirable I should have placed nearer my disposal.

I had formed a friendship with Mr. W. C. Conine, the lottery and exchange broker of Baltimore, who had now visited Philadelphia for the purpose of extending his business, by opening an office in this city. The party with whom he was to have associated himself, not making his appearance agreeable to promise, he requested me to superintend the fitting up of the office, promising to return before the drawing of the Union Canal Lottery. So well pleased was he with the arrangements I had made on his behalf, that he acceded to a proposition made by me. We commenced business in Third street, trading under the name of W. C. Conine.

Prosperity seemed now to flow in upon me from all quarters. The favourable impression which I had made upon Mr. Kilmer during my short stay in New York, induced him to offer me a situation in Boston, at the old Federal Street Theatre, of which he was the manager; Finn, his partner, wishing me to name my own terms and expectations.

Being now really servicable to Warren and Wood, and established with a rising reputation, in favour with my audience, Mr. Wood urged me to renew our business relations, and bury the recollection of past grievances. A proposition was made, agreeable to all parties, which I accepted, and stated to Mr. Finn my regret that I could not at present accept his offer, having formed a further engagement in Philadelphia.

My original engagement would have expired by limitation, on the 30th of November, 1825. But I was now, in a pecuniary point of view, independent of the managers; my business yielding me a greater income than I received from the treasury of the theatre. The mutual assistance we were enabled, each to render the other, was now the only bond which continued our connection.

The first star of the season was Booth, who played Richard the Third, on the 6th of December, followed by Cooper. Conway also paid us a short visit, playing to miserable houses. On the 8th of February, 1826, "Cherry and Fair Star," with its looking-glass bower, and innumerable reflected representations of dancing cupids, was produced with great success, not only attracting crowded houses, but giving general satisfaction to the audience.

CHAPTER XI.

Brilliant Prospects of the New Season. Kean, Miss L. Kelly, and Forrest. Row Extraordinary. The Acting American Theatre. Neagle, the Artist. The Author in Trouble. National Prejudices. Foolish Quatrains.

THE season which commenced in Philadelphia, on the 21st of November, 1825, with ■■■ "West Indian," and "Love, Law and Physic," was one, rendered memorable by the second visit of Kean, the first appearance of Miss L. Kelly; and last, although by no means least, the introduction of Mr. E. Forrest, as a star, in his native city—three events, of themselves sufciently important to make an "epoch" in the history of the drama.

Cooper was the first star of the season, as usual, attracting good houses, although his Richard the Third was an execrable performance. Strange as it may appear, he was not even perfect in the text, for which he was justly handled by the able critics of the United States Gazette, who wrote under the signature of "Jacques."

Watkins Burroughs also played an engagement, in the early part of the season, and had an excellent benefit—but, "costs mount."

Mr. Kean arrived in New York during the fall of 1825: of his reception no one is ignorant. The people here have been so kind to the citizens of Boston, during his first visit to the United States, by refusing to act, because the house was not sufficiently filled, they felt and resented by every city in the Union. In New York, after the second night, he was welcomed, and peace restored between the actor and his audience; but in Boston, the only city who pleaded justification, and in whom repentment was praiseworthy, he was not permitted to act,—flight alone preserved his personal safety. His lord entered into an engagement with Messrs. Warren and Wood, to play in Philadelphia; but his reception in New York and Boston, Mr. Wood became alarmed, and wrote to Kean that while the present excitement continued, if he came to Philadelphia, he could not contract, he could not be answerable for the consequences.

His manager having expressed his fears, it naturally followed that Mr. Kean declined a contest so unequal—a whole nation in arms against a single individual, and an individual a foreigner and an actor!

In New York, he published the following Card in the Courier and Enquirer:—

"Mr. Kean:—Sir—With oppressed feelings, heart rending to my friends, and triumphant to my enemies, I make an appeal to that country famed for hospitality to the stranger, and mercy to the conquered. Allow me to say, sir, whatever are my offences, I disclaim all intention of doing anything in the shape of disrespect towards the inhabitants of New York. They received me from the first with an enthusiasm, grateful, in those hours, to my pride—in the present, to my memory. I cannot recall to my mind any act or thought that did not prompt me to an unfeigned acknowledgment of their favours as a public, and profound admiration of the private worth of those circles in which I had the honour of moving.

"That I have committed an error appears too evident, from the all-declaring voice of the public; but surely it is but justice to the delinquent, whatever may be his enormities, to be allowed to make reparation when the offences were committed. My misunderstanding took place in Boston—to Boston I shall necessarily go to apologise for my indiscretions. I this country now under different feelings and aspirations than on a former occasion. I was an ambitious man, and the proud representative of Shakespeare's heroes. The spark of ambition is extinct, and I merely ask a shelter in which to close my professional and mortal career. I give the weapon into the hands of my enemies; if they see leave they will not turn it against the defenceless.

(signed,) EDWARD KEAN."

On the evening of the 9th of January, in [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] from the audience, Mr. Wood, after what had passed, [redacted] [redacted] temerity [redacted] inform them that [redacted] his wish, [redacted] well [redacted] his interest, to gratify the audience; but he had no power to drag Mr. Kean before them. If [redacted] declined fulfilling [redacted] engagement, Mr. Wood had no power to compel his appearance.

Knowing what had taken place, I could not suffer a friend, [redacted] whom I [redacted] indebted for many acts of kindness, [redacted] labour [redacted] a charge which [redacted] adding fuel to fire. I stated [redacted] gentlemen, who felt an interest [redacted] cause, that Kean would willingly visit the city, if assured of personal safety; that Mr. Wood had written to him that his life might be endangered by the fulfilment of an engagement he had openly this night accused him of violating.

The result is known. Mr. Mosier was dispatched to New York to inquire into the truth of all the statements; the theatre was closed for two nights; and on Wednesday, the 18th of January, Kean appeared as "Richard the Third." The row which followed was a serious affair—the outrages perpetrated disgraceful to a civilized community. Rotten eggs, children's bullet-bullets, and other small missiles, were thrown upon the stage in countless numbers; long before [redacted] opening of the doors, the approaches [redacted] the theatre were blocked up by a dense mass of human beings, eager to obtain admission. The appearance of Kean [redacted] signal of assault. In vain he attempted to make himself heard amid the din and uproar. In pantomime, he proceeded; leaving the stage, to be greeted in a similar manner upon his re-appearance. His was a situation in which his worst enemy might have pitied him. At length, wearied by their own exertions, the noise partially ceased, and afforded him an opportunity of addressing a few words [redacted] the audience:—"Friends of the drama, [redacted] is your quarrel—not mine." From [redacted] moment he [redacted] suffered to proceed [redacted] interruption—the [redacted] falling amid hisses and applause so nearly equal, as to render it doubtful which party obtained a triumph. Many there were, who, having shown their disapprobation [redacted] conduct, by saluting him with a sharp hiss on [redacted] appearance, became warm advocates for his engagement to proceed without further insult. A vast crowd assembled round the stage door in Carpenter Street, to [redacted] his departure [redacted] theatre.

As he entered the carriage, a gentleman on the steps proposed three cheers for Kean, which were given with hearty good will, and in those cheers, his pardon, so far as Philadelphia was concerned, was pronounced. He had erred—he had been punished—and the attempt to renew the scene, when he appeared as Othello, had been suppressed promptly. The offenders being so small a minority, were ejected from the theatre, and his engagement brought to a prosperous conclusion, on the 2nd of February, 1826, during which he played Richard the Third, Othello, King Lear, Sir Giles Overreach, Sir E. Mortimer, Hebeus Glauroy, Macbeth, Brutus, and Hamlet. The theatre, on the night of his benefit, when he repeated Richard the Third, was crowded from the pit to the gallery. When the curtain fell he was loudly called for, and addressed the audience in nearly the following words:—“Ladies and gentlemen—my life has been a chequered one—at one time reaching the pinnacle of ambition—at another sunk in the lowest ebb of misfortune. I appeared before you at the commencement of the present engagement, sick and dejected by the gloom which the malignity of enemies had thrown around me, anxious and willing to resign the contest; but the kindness of a Philadelphia audience has dispelled those visions of despair, and I hope I shall have the honour, early next season, of appearing before this kind auditory.”—He retired amid the cheering of the audience, which lasted several seconds after he left the stage, Mr. Wood appearing and promising he would perform Hamlet on the following evening, the only night he had at his disposal.

What a compound of generosity, talent, and folly, was Edmund Kean; he never forget an act of kindness, and was sure to repay it tenfold: but the following anecdote will prove that he was also tenacious, and unforgiving of wrong.

When, in the height of popularity, while performing at Portsmouth, England, he was requested by the manager, and two or three of his friends, to accompany them after rehearsal to the Inn, and take a glass of Madeira; the landlord being apprised that Mr. Kean was of the party, ushered them into an elegant room, where he thanked the actor for the honour that he did him, and overwhelmed him with civilities. Kean, fixing his eyes upon the landlord, and looking only as he could look, said: “Mr. ———, I came into your house at the request of these gentlemen, to partake of some refreshment, not to be pestered with your civilities, which, to me, are so many insults. Look at me, sir—well—do you recollect me?—I see you do not—but you know that I am Mr. Kean—Edmund Kean, sir—that same man that I was fifteen years ago, when you kept a small inn, and I was a member of a strolling company of players, who acted at your fair. I remember well that I went one day into the bar of your house, and called for half a pint of porter, which, after I had waited your pleasure patiently, was given to me by you with one hand, while the other was extended to receive the money. Never can I forget your insolent demeanour, or the sourness of my mortified feelings. Look at me again, sir. What alteration beyond that of dress do you discover in me? Am I a better man than I was then? What is there in me now, that you should overwhelm me with your compliments? Keep your wine, sir--it would choke me. Come, gentlemen, let us leave his house;" and the actor walked away from the mortified and abashed landlord. This was related to me by an eye-witness, and was I believe, published in the London Theatrical Observer, some years ago.

In consequence of the active part I had taken in bringing the engagement of Mr. Kean before the public, Mr. Wood looked upon me with no very favourable eye; all the old prejudices between us were revived, and he was not long in finding, as he supposed, an opportunity to make me feel his power. To this cause I attribute the frocs which took place some time afterwards, in the play of "Columbus," of which I shall have occasion to speak more at large in its proper place.

In the month of January of the present year, (1838,) in conjunction with Mr. Lopez, the prompter of the theatre, I commenced the publication of a work entitled "The Acting American Theatre, embellished with portraits of the actors belonging to the American stage, intended as a companion to "Oxberry's English Drama." This work, although a losing concern to me, deserves a kind remembrance, for having placed conspicuously before the public a most deserving young artist, who now stands acknowledged as one of the first portrait painters in the United States; I allude to a Mr. Neagle, whose picture of Patrick Lyon has procured for him a well-merited reputation. He painted for me for this work the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. Duff, Mr. Wood, Mr. Warren, Mr. Hilson, Mrs. Hilson, Mr. Cowell, Mr. and Mrs. Barnes, Mr. E. Forrest, Mr. Macready, Mr. Wemyss, Mr. Booth, Mr. Kean, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Fosta, Mr. Lee, Miss Kelly, Mrs. Waring, Mrs. Burke, Mr. Thayer, and Mr. Rollins.

Mr. Durand, of New York, and Mr. Longacre, of Philadelphia, then considered the best artists in the United States, were engaged to engrave these portraits; but after issuing sixteen numbers, I found my subscription list daily languishing. The work was unfortunate from the commencement; Mr. Poole, the publisher, failed, involving the accounts in a maze of difficulty. I found it impossible to extricate them. Murden, the theatrical publisher of New York, the agent for the work, also failed, making no return of sales.

The only parties to whom I was indebted for attention, and prompt remittances, are my old friend Beale, of Baltimore, and Mr. Bourne, of New York.

Tuesday, 11 of February, 1828, Philadelphia one of the greatest European actors trod their boards for years, in the person of

LYDIA KELLY.

Perhaps I am scarcely justified in recording Miss Kelly's name as a star of foreign growth—her popularity being purely American. Mr. Stephen Price engaged her in London, in consequence of Miss Jones having refused to cross the Atlantic, the popularity of her sister, Miss Fanny Kelly, the melodramatic heroine of the British stage, lending a charm to her, name, of which an American manager judiciously availed himself.

The opportunity ever offered more favourable to the views of a young and fashionable girl to take the town by storm. The Philadelphia audience were tired of the comedies of the ladies belonging to the theatre: although Miss Kelly's features were too masculine to be considered handsome, yet the dashing figure and lively spirit of her acting at once carried the feelings of her audience captive. She played her curtesy in the character of Letitia Hardy, in the "Belle's Stratagem," with triumphant success. Engagement following engagement in rapid succession; she must have remained at least six months during her visit, leaving the theatre with a reputation established as a leading star in the theatrical hemisphere.

Everything seemed to operate in her favour. Having been prevented from visiting the theatre during Kean's engagement, on his departure, appeared the claim exclusive right to occupy the dress boxes. It strongly did they turn out in Miss Kelly's favour, and a gentleman might consider himself highly favoured if he could obtain a seat. She was the reigning goddess of comedy: and of excellent manner in which they were acted was a constant theme of praise—their continued attraction, a proof of gratification received by the audience. We had Wood, Warren, Jefferson, Duff, Wemyss, Francis, Burke, and occasionally Cooper and Burroughs; while in the female department, the theatre in America could approach us in talent, Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Duff, Mrs. Darley, Mrs. Anderson, and Mrs. Francis, all ranging through the dramatic personae.

Philadelphia contributed largely to her success. Miss Kelly boasts of having acquired, without receiving a single dollar, until all her engagements were fully paid, sharing the profits only, and entailing no extra expenses upon the management—an example all stars ought to follow.

Although she was rigorous, she was rigid in exacting her rights. On one occasion, during the management of Lamb and Coyle, she refused to proceed with the fifth "Know your Own Mind," until the money due her was forthcoming. It was ridiculous enough to see Lady Bell, sitting on the stage, receiving in her lap the rouleaus of silver, handing them to her Irish waiting-woman to count, who bore them off in triumph before the eyes of the poor actors, who knew too well the consequence of this drain upon the treasury. No salaries for them.

She was a tyrant, but an agreeable tyrant. She was quarrelsome with you to day, and to-morrow willing to make any concession to reinstate herself in your good opinion. She was impossible to be angry with her for any length of time. She had a difficult task to "manage managers," but she was fully equal to it.

As an actress she will be remembered with pleasure, as whose popularity remained unimpaired to the last hour of her appearance; retiring from the stage with her fame at its meridian, she played Letitia Hardy, Beatrice, Lady Teazle, Rosalind, Hardecastle, Mrs. Oakley, Lady Bell, Violante, Julianna, Juliet, Emily Tempest, Lydia Languish, Portia, Miss Dorrillon—and had likewise considerable pretensions as a vocalist. She left us on the 1st of March, playing a longer consecutive engagement than any within my recollection.

I now approach a period of my theatrical career which had almost terminated it abruptly. The play "Columbus," having been revived, I was cast the part of Harry Herbert, an English adventurer. During the rehearsal I carelessly neglected to bring my written part of the character to the theatre, and was reading the following passage from the prompt-book:—

"Will you, great sir, condescend to indulge the vanity, and when you have nothing else to do, write to England the story of my fate, that when my fortunes be inquired after, my friends, with joy sparkling through a tear, may say, 'Herbert stuck to his commander to the last, and died as every Englishman should.'"

Mr. Wood interrupted me by exclaiming, "You may say that, sir: say 'brave man,' not 'Englishman.'" Perceiving any reason for such an alteration of the language of the author, I merely asked the necessity for such a change—the answer was, "The necessity in my will and pleasure." This led to "a scene," not very creditable to either party. If in the respect due to my manager, he certainly did not adopt the course best suited to convince me of the impropriety of openly violating the established rules of the theatre. Threats were exchanged, which rendered it impossible for me, without loss of self-respect, to withdraw from the position in which I found myself most unexpectedly placed.

I was officially informed by the prompter that if I persisted in speaking the sentence, as printed, the manager had instructed him to forfeit me my week's salary. And here the matter should have rested, until the overt act, which rendered me liable to the penalty, had been committed; but a second communication produced a result in which the feelings of both parties were totally disregarded; nor will I insult my readers by transcribing the gross language which took place between us.

On the afternoon of the 17th of April, a friend called at my lottery office, in Chestnut street, to inquire whether there was any truth in the report that Mr. Wood and myself had had a serious quarrel. When answered in the affirmative, he told me there was a party formed to hiss me, during the performance, which was to take place in the evening. I was inclined to laugh at this, deeming it improbable that any audience would trouble themselves about the disputes of managers and actors, where their own amusement was not interrupted; but I found that he was correct, and I must be prepared to meet the result. As the play progressed, the actors began to think I should yield the point; however, at the proper time I delivered the obnoxious speech, exactly as I found it in the prompt-book. Two or three slight hisses followed, and I was congratulating myself that this tempest in a tea-pot had subsided. In this I was deceived; when I next appeared I was assailed by such a general hiss as is heard within the walls of a theatre.

I immediately dropped my assumed character, and addressed the audience :-

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—These are sounds I am so unaccustomed to hear directed towards me within these walls, that it would be folly to pretend ignorance of their cause. I am to attribute them to a misunderstanding between Mr. Wood and myself, relative to the word "Englishman," which I uttered when I last left the stage. Allow me to ask you whether the name of England is a disgrace. [No, Warrys, no.] I am an Englishman, and now appeal to you as Americans—what would you think of an American, who, on the other side of the Atlantic, should have occasion to pay a compliment to his country, in these words, "Die as an American citizen ought," who should be told "It is my will and pleasure that you insert "Englishman," or I will snip your ears off;" what would you think of him who under such a threat, would be dastard enough to submit? [Bravo, Wemyss—well said—bravo!]

Mr. Wood now made his appearance. In his address to the audience he stated that his predecessor, Mr. Wignell, had erased the words, which he with a pen, scratched from the prompt-book, after our altercation had taken place, and with his own hand wrote the word brass over the printed word English. Nor was this the only mis-statement which caused me to form the sudden resolution of placing the whole facts as they occurred, before the audience. When he had finished, the audience called loudly for the continuation of the play, when I requested their indulgence for one minute, commencing—

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—Allow me one word. There is not a syllable of truth in what Mr. Wood has uttered. (Hisses.) He has boasted he can turn the Philadelphia audience around his finger at any moment. I acknowledge he possesses a fluency of language which I do not, but situated as I now am, it becomes necessary that the whole truth should be known. He said he had cowed every Englishman he ever had to deal with, and he would cow me too. He threatened, if I dared to utter that speech, he would forfeit me. Under excitement I did say, if he did, I would thrash him, and so I will."

Here I was interrupted with a shower of hisses, cries of "go on with the play," &c., &c. My first appeal was received enthusiastically; and had I stopped there, my triumph would have been complete and unalloyed; but, in losing my temper as I listened to gross misrepresentation, I perilled my cause. My final triumph was more owing to the words of my author, than to my adroitness in managing my case.

In returning to my assumed character of Harry Herbert, my first speech ran thus:—"I have not had a bit of fighting for a long time, and damme, if this has not given me a relish for it."

Those only [redacted] were present can form an idea of the electrical effect produced upon the audience, the theatre fairly shook with applause and laughter. This turned the tide once again in my favour. When Mr. Wood appeared shortly afterwards as Columbus, the hisses were both sharper and louder than those directed against me, in the commencement of this disgraceful and humiliating scene, and so continued to the close of the performance.

On the following day, the "revue" at the theatre formed the general topic of conversation. Opinion being divided as to the justice of the decision of the audience, and a general belief [redacted] contest between the manager [redacted] the [redacted] would [redacted] resumed, [redacted] prevalent, my friends demanded from me a pledge that I would remain quiet and leave my [redacted] as it stood, entirely in their hands. To this I could scarcely object, [redacted] I [redacted] the theatre on the evening of the 18th, expecting, I hardly knew what, but determined to meet it boldly.

When I appeared as Captain Bolding, in the Rencontre, there was a slight attempt [redacted] him, promptly silenced. As I raised my eyes, I saw [redacted] gentlemen, busily engaged with [redacted] hand, each ejecting from the pit an offender, the [redacted] apparently enjoying the [redacted]. The enemy being routed, my friends prudently desisted from showing any marks of disapprobation towards Mr. Wood; and so far [redacted] the public were concerned, the matter [redacted] at rest forever.

[redacted] was the Retort dealt to me by Mr. Wood, for [redacted] Officer administered to him by me in the affairs of Kean. However, he mislaid his calculation, as the event proved, but he made the attempt boldly.

In consequence of this fracas, for four years [redacted] acted together, in the [redacted] theatre, without exchanging words, off the stage; but like all other foolish quarrels, time has obliterated its recollection, and Mr. Wood and Mr. Wemyss [redacted] upon the same terms as when they [redacted].

CHAPTER XII.

Mr. Francis' Farewell of the Stage. Oh, Shame! where is thy Blush. First Appearance of Mr. E. Forrest as a Star. Portrait of the American Tragedian as Rollo. Account of his First Appearance in London.

[redacted] the 18th of May, Mr. Francis, the oldest actor [redacted] the United States, and [redacted] to whom the Philadelphians were indebted for many a hearty laugh, announced his farewell benefit, previous [redacted] his retirement from the duties of an arduous profession. I almost [redacted] to write, that it [redacted] one [redacted] worst hour, not only of the season, but which [redacted] been seen in the present theatre. I cannot better express my indignation than to quote from the correspondent of the United States Gazette. "Mr. Francis' unsuccessful appeal [redacted] a stigma [redacted] city; but [redacted] it [redacted] is—the favour of the public is lavished on stars, while the deserving but less aspiring performer is neglected and disregarded. [redacted] though flattered and applauded, he is suffered to [redacted] into want and penury. This evening may afford the useful lesson to performers particularly, that public favour is no surety.

—He that depends upon 't
Swims with arms of lead,
And hews down oaks with rushes.

current of popularity is as changeable as the winds which blow from all points of the heavens, and no actor is so wisely who makes the best of it when it sets in against him. The public is neither just or merciful in the distribution of its favours."

The performance selected for this occasion was the comedy "— stoops to Conquer," and a new farce which had been written for me, entitled "Exit in a Hurry." Poor Francis survived this mortification many months.

the evening of May, 1826, is a night not easily to be forgotten by those who take an interest in theatrical matters. It was the occasion of Mr. Porter's benefit, and this evening that Mr. E. Forrest returned to his native city, which he had just left to seek for fame in the far West. He was acting as Jaffier, in Otway's tragedy of Venice Preserved, and was warmly and enthusiastically applauded, and as the curtain fell, a great gong was called for, which was announced for Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. The theatre, however, was closed on Thursday, but Mr. Forrest acted Kella, on Friday the 19th of May, and repeated it again on Saturday, when the theatre closed for the season.

When I first met

FRANCIS FORREST,

behind the scenes of the Chestnut Street Theatre, in the month of May, 1826. He was a modest, unassuming young man, who scarcely mustered courage sufficient to enter the green-room, where were assembled many of the actors the American stage could boast of. Mr. Charles Porter introduced me to him, and expressed a wish that I should see him act the part of Jaffier. I took my seat in the boxes, determined to be pleased; and I was so. I expressed myself warmly in his praise to Mr. Frederick Huber, who took much interest in his welfare. He said, "Frank, if you really think what you say of me, favour to publish his name in the next number of the 'Acting American Theatre;' it will serve a very worthy young man, and do you no harm." "Very well, you get his assent to sit for the picture; I will instruct Neagle when he visits New York to paint it." I addressed a letter to Mr. Forrest on the subject; the result was the publication of the first engraved portrait of the American tragedian, as Rolls, in "Pizarro." Thus commenced an intimacy which has continued ever since.

Whenever chance and talent unite to place one member of a profession above all competitors, it is not surprising that weak mortals should have their brains turned by unlooked-for and unhoped success. When moving himself in a very humble position as an actor, he was loud in his denunciation of Mr. Cooper, for the "brusque" manner which he thought proper to adopt towards the members of the profession less fortunately placed than himself. Such conduct is any thing but becoming, and deserves not only the censure of the profession, but the public; yet Mr. Forrest has carried his rudeness to much greater extent than ever Cooper did in his haughtiest day of theatrical power. He possesses many excellent traits of character, and none more than his affectionate care and forethought for his mother and sister, to whom he devoted the first fruits of his rising popularity. He can also at times be generous to his late fortunate brethren of the sock and buskin. But there is one blot on his escutcheon which never can be erased; he suffered Mrs. Gilfert, the widow of a man to whom he owed both fame and fortune, to be buried by a subscription raised by the actors of the Philadelphia theatre, although he was aware of her distressed situation before her death.

Mr. Forrest owed his rapid rise in public favour as an actor, in the first place, to his birth as an American; secondly, to nature, for the endowment of great personal advantages; and thirdly, to that chance, without which the two former would have been useless. On opening the Bowery Theatre, in the city of New York, in 1836, Mr. Gilfert, the manager, (and as shrewd and capable a one as ever directed a theatre,) knew it was necessary to find some one whom he could place in a prominent situation, to arouse the curiosity of the public, and direct their attention to his new building. He found the material in young Forrest, and left the press and his own ingenuity to work out the result. His appearance at the Park Theatre, in Othello, for Woodhull's benefit, gave the cue, and Mr. Forrest was forthwith announced as a star of the first magnitude, and so upheld at all sacrifices, until he really became what in the first instance he had no pretensions to be considered. However, Shakespeare says, "some men are born to greatness, others achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them." Of this latter class was decidedly our young tragedian; but endowed with strong common sense, he watched his opportunities, and availing himself of every chance, he finally in his native city of Philadelphia obtained from Rufus B. Blake the enormous sum of two hundred dollars per night, to which he has since adhered, or only depends from for the still more ruinous terms to the managers of half of the gross receipts of each night's performance.

Keeping steadily in view the fortune he was determined to acquire, he offered a premium of five hundred dollars for the best play in five acts, written by an American author, of which he was to be the hero. The prize was borne off by Augustus Stone, who produced the play of "Metamora," in which Mr. E. Forrest has drawn more money than in all his subsequent efforts. His representation of the Indian Chief is a finished piece of acting, which may be equalled, but never will be excelled. His Spartacus, in Dr. Bird's tragedy of the "Gladiator," is also a part which, being his own by copyright, there will never be an opportunity of drawing comparisons; and if there were, they certainly would not be to his disadvantage; but as this was the character in which he staked his reputation before a London audience, I subjoin the account of his first appearance, taken from the London Times of the 18th of October, 1856.

"Drury Lane Theatre.—Mr. Edwin Forrest, who has established a high reputation in America, his native country, as a tragedian, appeared for the first time before an English audience at this theatre, last night. The character selected for his debut was that of Spartacus, in a tragedy of that title, written by Dr. Bird, also an American. Mr. Forrest was received with a hearty warmth, which, from the first moment of his appearance, left no doubt, if any could have been entertained, that the audience were well disposed to accept his exertions for their entertainment. He is a tall, rather robust man, of some thirty years of age, not remarkably handsome, but with expressive features, and that cast of countenance which is well suited for theatrical effect. His voice is remarkably powerful, his figure rather vigorous than elegant, and his general appearance prepossessing. The subject of the tragedy is one admirably adapted for scenic representation, and has already been essayed in the French and German theatres. Dr. Bird appears not to have borrowed from any of his predecessors, but to have preserved in the main features of the drama the historical facts relating to his hero. In concentrating the interest and the action of the play in the character of Spartacus, he has bestowed very slight pains in the delineations of the other characters. The consequence of this is, that all the scenes in which the hero is not in action, are languid, and all the other personages in the play are very faintly sketched. With such materials as history furnished him, he might easily have done more and better. The wife of Spartacus is said to have accompanied him in his exploits, and by her supposed skill in divination, to have prompted and encouraged some of his most daring enterprises. This hint might have sufficed to make Seneca a more important personage than Dr. Bird's Sancy has created. Our business, however, is with the play as we find it, not as it might have been. [Here follows a description of the plot of the play.]

"The latter part of the play is less vigorous than the former."

there are some scenes of stirring interest in which Mr. Forrest made a powerful impression on the audience. The poetry of the drama is rather powerful than polished; and although it contains some passages of considerable beauty, it is more generally characterized by a rough passionate strain, in which gracefulness is sacrificed to force. One speech, in which Spartacus describes the beauty of his Italian valleys before the fall of the Romans, and contrasts it with the devastation which had followed their footsteps, struck us as being particularly happy. At the conclusion of the play Mr. Forrest was called for, and began to address the audience, a practice not usual nor safe, at least on this occasion. He thanked them for the reception they had bestowed on him, and expressed his gratification at finding in that reception a proof of their good will towards America. Now, although their praises were warm and hearty, they were given to him personally, and simply because they thought he deserved them, and would have been just as freely bestowed if he had come from Kamtschatka as from New York. There are no national prejudices between an audience and an actor, nor any where else in this country, which could make it for a moment questionable that a deserving artist would be well received, from whatever quarter of the globe he arrived. When, however, Mr. Forrest, encouraged by the applause, began to thank them for the favours they had shown to the tragedy, he provoked some dissent, the audience not seeming to think as highly of the poet as of the player—so Mr. Forrest made his bow and retired.

"We shall be glad to see him in some other character, and if he acquits himself hereafter as well as he did on this occasion, he will have no reason to be dissatisfied with his voyage, and the theatre will have engaged an able performer, who, to very considerable skill in his profession, adds the possession of a somewhat novel and a much more spirited style of playing than any other tragic actor now on our stage."

I will now give the cast of the play on its first representation on the London stage.

Lucius Crassus, Ward; Gellius, F. Coote; Lentulus, Hooper; Jovius, Barley; Brachius, Matthews; Florus, Brindal; Spartacus, E. Forrest; Phasarius, Cooper; Enomais, Baker; Crixus, Darrest; Mummus, Mears; Scrophia, Honnet; Boy, Marshall; Centurion, T. Matthews; Julia, Mrs. Hooper, (her first appearance); Senona, Huddart, (first appearance in five years).

Also the original in New York:—

Maron Lucinius Crassus, Richings; Lucius Povey; Scrophia, Whitely; Jovius, Woodhall; Mummus, Hayden; Balistus Lentulus, Blakeley; Florus, son to Lentulus, Field; Brachius, Thorne; Spartacus, E. Forrest; Phasarius, Berry; Enomais, Nissen; Crixus, Reed; Centurion, King; Slave, Bisset; Boy of Spartacus, E. Turnbull; Julia, Mrs. Wallack; Senona, Mrs. Sharpe. Gladiators, 20; Roman Guards, 16; Lictors, 6; Patricians, 6; Ladies, 8; 8 Female Slaves; 2 Children.

A notice of the manager's announcement, in the under-line of the London play-bills:—

Mr. Edwin Forrest,
 The eminent American Tragedian, Whose first appearance last evening on the British stage, (before one of the most crowded audiences ever assembled in this theatre,) [redacted] those enthusiastic [redacted] of success, which have stamped [redacted]
 one of the Greatest Actors [redacted] ever graced an English Theatre, &c. in consequence of the unbounded applause with which he [redacted] received in the New Tragedy of The Gladiator! have the honour of repeating the character of Spartacus three times every week, until further notice.

[redacted] Bunn was determined to make the most of his bargain, and doubtless reaped a rich harvest from the exertions of the American tragedian.

[redacted] Shakspearian characters, with [redacted] exception [redacted] Othello, where [redacted] terrific energy [redacted] the [redacted] and [redacted] Burch now holds his audience in breathless amazement, are not above mediocrity; his Richard the Third, and his Macbeth, do not even deserve that name; but in those characters which have [redacted] [redacted] him, in which his physical requisites have [redacted] brought into play in the most favourable manner, [redacted] [redacted] tains a reputation which will be [redacted] so long as [redacted] American drama, of which he may be called the founder, shall exist.

There is [redacted] name I shall have occasion to refer to more frequently than Mr. Forrest's, as I progress, or [redacted] whom I [redacted] have more to write.

The Philadelphia Theatre having closed for the season, the company proceeded to Baltimore, where [redacted] opened with the play of the "Stranger;" but our season was brought to an abrupt termination by the "Kean row." From the opening, there was a feverish anxiety to know when Kean's engagement would commence, or whether he intended to visit Baltimore.
 No sooner [redacted] the announcement of his [redacted] appear, than it became evident [redacted] reception would not be a friendly although he hoped, and his friends [redacted] sanguine the [redacted] would be the same [redacted] in New York and Philadelphia—an expression [redacted] public feeling [redacted] would subside. He had re-requested [redacted] to play "Richmond," knowing [redacted] as long as [redacted] was possible to hold our ground, I should [redacted] [redacted] him, although the prospect of being hooted and pelted, [redacted] by [redacted] means a pleasant one. When he appeared as Richard the [redacted], the hubbub as usual commenced, but had apparently subsided during the [redacted] act, when every thing [redacted] [redacted] to quiet, that I [redacted] [redacted] to obtain [redacted] portion of [redacted] drom from the Shakespeare, where I boarded. I was surprised on my return to find the storm raging more furiously than ever. This was owing to the injudicious conduct of Kean's friends, who ruined his cause. During the early part of the evening, they had displayed two placards in front of each stage box, the one bearing the motto, "Let the friends of Kean be silent," the other, "Kean for ever!" Had they adhered to their maxim of silence, their triumph would have been complete, but although their tongues were silent, their hands were too active; on the slightest opposition, they seized the aggressor and ejected him from the theatre. Those treated in this unceremonious manner, for exercising what they conceived to be their right, formed a group before the doors of the theatre, recapitulating their wrongs, to the already excited populace, waiting only for a leader to commence mischief; a brickbat thrown at the windows of the saloon, was followed by a rush towards the door. The theatre was saved from destruction by the spirited conduct of Mr. Montgomery, the mayor of the City, who interposed his person, assuring the mob, that none could enter that building for the purpose of mischief, except over his body; a pause took place, and that pause, in all probability saved the life of Kean—who was enabled to make his escape from the theatre; every carriage was searched, and it was not until assured that the object of their vengeance was beyond their reach, that the crowd dispersed, some remaining on the ground until daylight.

And where was the manager during all this riot and confusion? Mr. Wood, fearful of some serious mishap, left the city in the steamboat at five o'clock, on a plea of business; thus depriving Kean of the aid of that tongue, which for a long series of years, had guided the taste and quelled the unruly spirits of the theatre. Policy might have dictated his retreat, but justice to those under his control, should have held him fast at his post, in the hour of danger. He is a bad pilot who deserts the helm when his vessel is in the neighbourhood of breakers.

Thus ended Kean's performance at the Holiday-street Theatre, in June, 1826. On the following morning, Col. Benjamin Edes, a respectable and respected citizen of Baltimore, called upon me, and said, "Wentworth, if you are a friend of Kean's, get him out of the city; if he attempts to play to-night, we shall tar and feather him; and he may think himself lucky if he escapes with no further injury." Assured it was useless to endanger his safety, I proceeded directly to his hotel, told him he had no time to lose, but must prepare to leave the city without an instant's delay; that the excitement against him was increasing every moment, and that violence would attend any attempt to appear again upon the stage. He said, "My God! what shall I do! I have not a cent with me; this is so totally unexpected, where is it to end?" I enquired what sum would be sufficient for his immediate journey—he replied, two hundred dollars; this I procured from my friend Conine, and [redacted] in getting him safely out of the city. While many were enjoying, in anticipation, [redacted] they expected, Kean was safely on board the steamboat, on his way to Philadelphia. I accompanied him, leaving my [redacted] and children in the charge of Mr. Jackson. The Theatre in Baltimore was closed for the season, and the company returned to Philadelphia.

Kean was received in Philadelphia with open arms; a reaction had taken place in the public sentiment. Conceiving he [redacted] been sufficiently punished, pity resumed the place of resentment, and he was looked upon as a [redacted] man. The theatre was re-opened on the 12th of June, and [redacted] appeared as Richard the Third, with the tide of popular favour as strong in his behalf as ever it had been in his proudest days of success; and although he did shed tears at the idea of playing Shylock for a quarter of a dollar, all he received, (his terms being to share the receipts with the management, after deducting two hundred dollars, each night,) yet that night (the cause of which should be buried in oblivion,) crossed from his engagement, his attraction continued undiminished. The last night he played in Philadelphia was on the 26th of June, 1826, when he appeared as Cardinal Wolsey, in "Henry the Eighth," and Sylvester Daggerwood, for his benefit, leaving the stage in what mountebanks call a flip-sap, really well executed. But what a ridiculous association in the minds of his audience; the great tragedian, and the clown of a circus, both seen in the same person, and for the last time. Before he left the city he sent me the following note, enclosing the money borrowed in Baltimore:—

"DEAR WENTWORTH,

308 thanks!

"Take an opportunity of visiting our orb on the banks of the Hudson: you will find as honourable a gang as ever cried "stand" to a traveller, and fattened on pilage: though the captain may happen to be on duty, the troop delight in the winding fraternity, and you will be truly welcome.

"Sincerely, dear Wentworth,

(Signed,)

"EDWARD KEAN."

Addressed thus:—

"—Wentworth, Esq.,

"Tragedian, Comedian,

"Farcicalist, Lottorianist,

"Omniaist, non,

"Abnegation!!! Philadelphia."

I never had the pleasure of seeing him again. He was in Dublin when I was in England, in 1827; although hourly expected in Liverpool, I sailed, on my return, before his arrival. He never possessed a warmer friend, or more enthusiastic admirer. He sat for his portrait to Neagle, for the Acting American Theatre, which picture was afterwards purchased by George Munday.

Mr. and Mrs. George Harrett played a short engagement; after which Mr. E. Forrest returned and played his first regular star engagement, at the Chestnut-street Theatre, commencing on the 5th of July, with Othello; Rolla, on the 6th; William Tell, on the 7th; Earl Osmond, in the "Castle Spectra," on the 8th; Jaffier, on the 10th; and Othello, on the 11th; when the theatre was closed, and he accompanied us to Washington city, where he first acted Demon—since, one of his most favourite characters.

It was at the close of the summer season of 1826, that Mr. Wood retired from the management, having dissolved partnership with Warren. His situation as stage manager was filled by my old friend, Joe Cowell; and the season of 1826 and 1827, I may honestly say, was the most pleasant year of my American engagements. I heard with regret of his retirement, although I was fixed upon as his successor. In his "Thirty Years among the Players," he does injustice to Warren, and has made it appear that the actors engaged by Mr. Hallam, for Cowell and Simpson, surpassed in talent and attraction those engaged by me for the Chestnut-street Theatre; yet every play-goer knows he retired from the contest, and when he returned to renew it, after Warren's theatre had been opened thirty-five weeks, he was obliged to close; the "Gnome King" having so far surpassed his "Sleeping Beauty," that his theatre was deserted, while the Chestnut-street Theatre continued to be well attended to the close of the season.

CHAPTER XIII.

Baltimore season not worth even a passing record. Cowell's management. Macready's first appearance in Philadelphia. His disgraceful manner producing quite an excitement among the Actors against him. Great Effect of his Colloquial Acting. Sensible Conduct under Underserved Reproach. Note to the Author. First Appearance of Mrs. Knight, late Miss Povey. Her Great Success. Compliment to the ~~Author~~. First Appearance of Miss Hester Warren. First Appearance of Miss E. Jefferson, afterwards Mrs. S. Chapman. First Attempt at Management in the United States. Preparations to cross the Atlantic. Instructions and Departure.

THE Baltimore season concluded, we opened in Philadelphia on the 4th of December, 1826, with the play of the "Stranger," and the farce of the "Turnpike Gate." The talent of the company was inferior to any season I had yet known, and complaints were loud in all quarters, yet Cowell's name was a tower of strength. He was deservedly popular, both with the actors and the public, and no one regretted more than I did his retirement, notwithstanding I was selected as his successor. Mr. Macready was the first star of the season. He opened on the 10th of January, 1827, as Macbeth, and at once received the approbation which his high character as an actor deserved. He played Hamlet, Virginus, William Tell, Pierre, Coriolanus, Damon, Petruchio.

It was during the performance of "William Tell," a circumstance occurred which might have proved fatal to his future prospects in the United States. The property man (worthy old Charley Ward) had, through negligence, forgotten to provide an arrow to break before Geiler, in the fourth act of the play, compelling Macready to devote from his own quiver, one so loaded and poised, as to prevent the possibility of a failure in the most critical situation of the play. Not being one of the mildest tempered men, and irritated at the moment by the loss of, to him, a valuable stage property, he said, in anger, to the property man, who was waiting to make his apology, "I can't get such an arrow in your country, sir!" which was thus translated for him, "I can't get wood to make such an arrow in your country."

The anonymous letters sent to the then respectable conductors of the daily press, were enclosed to Mr. Macready, who, of course, disavowed their contents. He assembled the company upon the stage, by special request, read the accusation, and appealed to them, collectively and individually, to say, whether any one present had ever heard him make use of such an expression.

All remaining silent, he made a neat appeal to their feelings, stating, that if he had personally offended any one of them, he regretted it, and held himself personally responsible; but he hoped none who had heard him were base enough to make use of such means as the letter he held in his hand, in revenge for supposed slight.

It is really singular that, deriving all, or nearly all, the acting plays from England, applauding and constantly in association with the best English actors, there should exist, behind the scenes of the American theatres, such an inveterate hatred to the foreign artist, that every little word uttered should be construed into an intentional national insult, which, magnified by the malign report of the lower order of actors and their tavern companions, is introduced before the curtain, to the annoyance of at least two thirds of the audience assembled for amusement; who, provided the actor entertains them for the moment, care nothing about him or his opinions, except to furnish a subject of conversation for a few minutes at their next evening party. Had the penny press been in existence during Macready's engagement, a rash word, harmlessly spoken, to a negligent property man, would have been sufficient to have terminated his career on the American stage. The poison once disseminated, no opportunity would have been offered for justification: he would have been driven home in disgrace for an offence—never committed.

In rehearsing the play of Virginia, an occurrence took place which caused a hearty laugh at the expense of Mr. William Forrest, (brother to the tragedian) who was the Iollina. Caught by the natural tone and manner of Macready, who, turning suddenly, said, "Will you lead Virginia in, or do you wait for me to do it." "Whichever you please, Mr. Macready," was the ready answer, followed by such a laugh as only actors can enjoy. He even deceived the acting manager, Mr. Cowell, old and experienced as he was, in a similar manner in William Tell. When speaking to young Wheatley about his shoe being untied, Cowell said rather pettishly, "Don't keep us here all day, Mr. Macready, about the boy's shoe—go on with the rehearsal." These are compliments to the colloquial skill of Macready, as great as was ever paid to any actor by his professional brethren.

His Damon was by no means as good as Cooper's; it was too laboured, too cold and artificial, to reach the feelings of his audience. He confessed it was not a favourite character, and only assumed in compliance with the wishes of the manager.

He sat for his portrait to Hengle for the acting American Theatre, and the plates sent to him on that occasion produced the following note.

(CONT.)

Mr. Macready presents his best compliments to Mr. Wemyss, to thank him for his elegant collection of theatrical portraits. He can only regret that he has so little title to Mr. Wemyss's acknowledgments, and that he has had no simpler occasion of testifying his respect for one among the few members of his profession whose deportment and manner he has observed as creditable to it.

Approbation from Sir Hubert Stanley is praise indeed!

The next star was Mrs. Knight, (late Miss Povey,) who made her first appearance in Philadelphia, on the 29th of January, 1827, as Floretta, in the "Cabinet." Who does not remember the bewitching simplicity of

Mrs. KNIGHT!

The ~~simplicity~~ and ~~modesty~~ displayed in her acting, greatly enhancing the pleasure derived from the sweet tones she warbled forth in her ballads. She was the first female singer of cultivated taste, who had visited the United States since the days of Miss George, the Wowski of Coleman's "Jinks and Yarrow." Her attraction and popularity remained undiminished for many successive seasons. It was not only in opera she was a universal favourite, but her acting in Kate O'Brien in "Perfection," and Betty Finikin in "Gretchen Green," was truly excellent; it would have puzzled the most snarling critic to have found just cause for censure in the first named piece. So completely did she take her audience by surprise, that at the fall of the curtain, the Pit actually rose by acclamation, demanding a repetition, a compliment so very unusual in those days, when the habit of calling for every actor at the close of an engagement was not in vogue, that it was appreciated as no mean honour. She was pleased to thank me personally for my performance of Charles Paragon, insisting that I was entitled to my full share of the unexpected but highly valued compliment. Never was a more general shout of approbation heard within the walls of a theatre, than greeted my announcement of Mrs. Knight's compliance with the wishes of the audience. As I can call to mind no other instance on record, during my knowledge of the American stage, of such an occurrence, in justice to all concerned, I will record the cast.—Sir Laurence Paragon, Mr. C. Green; Charles Paragon, Mr. Wemyss: Sam, Mr. John Mills Brown; Kate O'Brien, Mrs. Knight; Susan, Mrs. C. Green. A more just estimate of the merit due to the actors, may be formed from the knowledge that the ~~parts~~ ~~of~~ ~~them~~ of them were ~~in~~ possession of ~~the~~ written parts, until the rehearsal on the day previous to the performance, which so gratified the brilliant audience assembled on the occasion of Mrs. Knight's benefit. It was a proud night for star, managers, &c. It is needless to add, it was repeated to an excellent house, and has retained possession of the stage ever since. I have seen many Kate O'Brien's, including Miss Kelly, Clara Fisher and Rock; but never one approached Mrs. Knight's excellence. It was indeed "Perfection."

On the 28th of February, Booth acted the tragedy of "Scylla." Mr. E. Forrest appeared as Damon, on the 7th of March. And during his engagement, which was not a very stable one, he played Othello, Rollo, William Tell, Sir El. Mortimer, King Lear, Jaffier, &c. on the 14th of March, Richard the Third; the worst representative of that character I ever witnessed; nor do I think he has ever improved his first false conception of the character. I may be wrong—but such is my opinion.

Macready returned on the 15th of March, commencing with Othello—playing the Stranger, Hamlet, Cardinal Wolsey, Macbeth, Romont, in the revived play of "Fanny Dowry;" Henry the 5th, Virginius, King John; and Felix, in the "Hunter of the Alps."

On the 16th of April, 1827, (Easter Monday,) Henry Wallack, who had become, since the death of Barrere, lessee of Chatham Garden Theatre, was engaged to produce the spectacle of "Brian Boroihome," which had drawn crowds to the city of New York. It was well prepared, the scenery excellently painted, and would doubtless have been successful, if its play-bill surrounded with "Harps," and its "Erin Go Bragh," in flaming red letters;—but, Mr. Webb, an actor of some repute, who was to have been the representative of Voltimar, had been studying ancient history too closely, and came to the conclusion, taking Shakspeare for his authority, that the Danes were powerful drinkers, and therefore appeared upon the stage so perfectly undiagnosed in liquor, that the audience thought proper to him, which he resented, by walking out of the theatre. Heyl the part; and the piece, in consequence of Webb's misconduct, was unequivocally damned. If ever a penal code should be enacted, for the sole punishment of actors, drunkenness should be a penitentiary offence, without the possibility of pardon. How many managers have had a prosperous season ruined, by the misconduct of one actor; and hundreds of dollars judiciously expended, lost for ever, by this worst of evil habits. The correction is in the hands of the public alone while they permit an actor, who has thus insulted them, to appear again, as if no offence had been committed, reformation is hopeless. Had Booth been banished, the stage might have lost an actor, but the example would have deterred others, who possessed not his talent, from venturing upon the experiment.—

was tolerated in brutality, it properly checked and rebuked, would have prevented Edmund Kean from offending in the same manner. His genius will be erratic,—this may be true; but the nervousness of the confidant, in Sheridan's farce of "The Critic," it, by request, he kept in the back ground.

For the daughter of Mr. Jefferson, whose appearance upon stage, as Rosina, in "Spanish Barber." If Miss Warren was the best "debutante"! she spoke so low, so completely lost self-possession, that, had it been for her father, she would scarcely have escaped derision. The only redeeming point in her performance of "An Old Man wooing," in which she feebly encored. It was an unfavourable beginning, and was to be expected.—But in the race commenced between Miss Warren and herself, although distanced in the first attempt, she outstripped her in her future career; rising step by step, she became, as Mrs. S. Chapman, the leading actress of the American stage, in the Park Theatre of New York, justly admired by every frequenter of the theatre; proving that the race is not always with the swift, or the battle with the strong. She married a second time, on the death of Mr. Chapman, Mr. Augustus Richardson, of Baltimore, retiring from the stage.

There was a similarity of fate in the career of these two ladies; both handsome, both possessed of talent, both married to foreigners, both left widows at an early age, and both entering a second time the state of wedlock; one dying in the height of her fame; the other having the highest goal of her ambition, voluntarily resigned her plaudits nightly bestowed upon her in the first theatre of her native country, to enjoy the blessings of domestic life, in retirement.

The play of "John Bull," established Mr. John Bull in favour of the audience, as a good delineator of Irish character. His Dennis Bulgruddery was the greatest charm of the play, repeated four nights at the close of the season. Mr. Warren's benefit took place on the 12th of May, 1827; the evening closing with the play of the "Cure for the Heartache," which was "Agreeable Surprise."

He proceeded as usual, to Baltimore, in the spring of 1828, while there, he was taken one morning by surprise, by an offer from Mr. Warren, to accept of acting and stage management of the theatres under his patronage; he crossed the Atlantic and recruited his dramatic company, by engaging new faces from England. The offer he made was so liberal, that I desired a few days for consideration. My friends whom I sulted on the occasion, strongly urged my acceptance; among others Mr. [redacted] E. Pratt, little dreaming that this arrangement would at no very distant period make him co-leader of those very theatres.

My professional pride was also shattered by the idea, that Mr. Wood's assertion of my total failure in America, would be forever set at rest, by my appearance among my old friends in London, after five years, as the manager of the Philadelphia Lottery. I therefore agreed to relinquish my lottery business, and on the 6th of Jan. 1827, made an engagement for three years with Mr. Warren, in which I promised to devote my time entirely to promote his

On the 20th of June, I sailed from Philadelphia, in the Tuscarora, commanded by Captain Serrill, to return to my native country, full of hopes and fears for the success of my mission. My instructions, and my views of those instructions were as follows. How well I performed my duty, the public have placed on record, by their almost unanimous approval of those actors with whom I intended to open the season of 1897 and 1898.

(CONT.)

“My Dear Son:

"In the mission you have so kindly undertaken for [redacted] you will please to observe the following instructions—First, the performers:

"A gentleman capable of acting first tragedy, or young men such as Harry Dornson, Claude, Leetins,—as to Hamlet, Richard, &c., you know since they have seen Keen. Moreover, and such actors of the present day, to perform such plays without actors of that name and grade, would be useless.

"A man capable of sustaining heavy puns, which I am obliged to send at Deputat, on 17 January."

<sup>27</sup> A young man who came in—on that subject you understand my views.

"A useful man to play low comedy, and if capable of more than that, the better; which will be four."

"A lady capable of leading to tragedy, ~~however~~ also another lady, who would perform Lady Macbeth. If a woman of the time of life who could undertake both, it would be better.

"The salaries not to exceed thirty dollars. I would rather have it, not more than six guineas; but if an object is to be gained, two dollars will not make any difference."

"Passage, and any advance you may make to be repaid by a weekly deduction.

"Every engagement for two years, and the deflection shall be apportioned to the time. It may happen that some of the parties may be married. Any arrangement which you think [redacted] for [redacted] [redacted] will be acceded to by me, as I am well convinced that you will do the best you can for the concern.

respect to Mr. Miller, you will please to enquire what he has sent; bring with you, what he has not, that you think will be useful; I want anything else. He can draw for the amount by way of Carey and Lee."

These instructions I was desired to show Mr. Richard Peters, Junr. of Philadelphia, and ask his advice upon the nature of them. On the 19th of June, 1837, he addressed me the following letter,

(COPY.)

"Philadelphia, June 19, 1837"

"DEAR SIR:—

"I have already delivered to you a bill of exchange for 75*l*. sterling, and have paid to you, by a check to your credit two hundred and thirty dollars. I now hand you a letter of credit from my friend, Mr. W. B. Evans, addressed to Mr. Grey White, London, by which you will be enabled to draw 150*l*. sterling. These are on account of Mr. Warren, and will be accounted for to me, by him. I have also made arrangements with Messrs. Thomas F. Cope and Sons, by which all passages for whom you may request a passage on board of any of the Philadelphia packets by a line addressed to the captains, will be received, and the prices of the passage will be paid here by Mr. Warren. Captain West, of the Montezuma, has agreed to charge for the passages, the stipulated price payable at the par of exchange. This will be a saving of about fifteen dollars in each.

The other captains will do the same, if you insist upon it, and if they will not, I have this completed all the arrangements assigned to me by Mr. Warren, and I trust they will be found satisfactory.

"A word or two about your project—as Mr. Warren has authorized me to speak of it. I think it fortunate that Hallam has been before you, and has made his selection; you know the force of those he has engaged, and must go beyond them. You will be able to ascertain what the merits of all those he has brought with him are, and you must get persons who are superior to them in talent and in personal appearance, and in reputation. Do not get a guinea a week, or even more, separate you, if they can be obtained. I know Warren will confirm this, and I will get him to say so to you in writing. It will be all-important that you accomplish the object of your visit upon the principles I have stated, and succeeding in it, you will put Mr. Cowell and S. at defiance. Allow me to remind you, that with the audience, who are to be amused at the English Street Theatre, polished manners, good exterior, and a guarded sense of decorum are all-important. I claim no more than your knowledge of us will concede, when I say that an actor who does not appear as a gentleman will never succeed here; this deficiency has been the downfall of the best of men. It is not that he shall act the gentleman well, but he shall be a gentleman who pleases us. Mr. F. has not competency to ascertain and judge of this matter, for his gentleman was vulgar, and his manner was not as courteous as yours. I do you no more than justice to say, you have always exhibited the qualifications so necessary and im-

BIOGRAPHY.

"Let your singer be a gentleman, and capable of playing the parts of opera, as such a person would exhibit their superior voice. High musical attainments are not so essential as expression, feeling, and vivacity; a good singer, not a superior one, who will maintain with respectability his parts in opera, will have much to do next season, with the Jefferson, who promises to be very attractive. I do not exactly understand what Mr. W. means by a ~~man~~ to play Belvidera, and another to play Lady Macbeth; the lady ~~will~~ can play the first ought to play the second. I think if you ~~use~~ ~~the~~ lady to play high tragedy, of middle age, not old, of good appearance, and I should say a lady who can play Lady Tairle, and the females in very high comedy, you would do better. If you could find a person, who with low comedy, can play well in melo-drama and in pathos, it would be well. Bring out the materials for two or more good pantomimes. ~~My~~ friend Warren is too much disposed to confidence; I would advise you to ~~engage~~ an agency for him altogether independent of Price & Co., and the New Yorkers, and let it ~~be~~ private; they will bite him off if they can, but this you can prevent, by a judicious selection.

"Arrangements should be made to have sent out all pieces which hit, if they are of a general nature. You may arrange with Mr. Curwin, to whom I give you a letter, to forward them from Liverpool, and let ~~the~~ agent send them to him; a little expense, ~~and~~, incurred, will be repaid. You remember you have active, enterprising, and skilful opponents; they are more—they are without principle, for so I ~~must~~ say of those, who, like Mr. Cowell, "have struck off Mr. W.'s actors," and of Mr. Simpson, who said, "~~Let~~ Warren get out who he will, I will ~~beat~~ them in New York in a ~~month~~." I say this to show you the necessity of assertion, of ~~firmness~~, of making your contracts explicit and positive.

"I also say so to induce you to procure performers of more attraction ~~than~~ ~~the~~ ~~late~~ ~~circus~~ habits of Mr. Hallam have enabled him to ~~use~~. Remember the comparison will be between those selected by Hallam and Mr. Wrennys. It will be the test of your judgment and your taste, and I feel satisfied you will surpass in both. I recommend to you, and will ~~ask~~ Warren to confirm it, if the payment of the passage out ~~will~~ be ~~an~~ an insurmountable objection, with a performer of high attainments, that you agree to pay it, stipulating that if Warren, to repay himself, desires to put up a benefit, in his or her name, ~~he~~ may do it. It will be very unfortunate, if, under such an arrangement, we would not be ~~repaid~~ the cost of the passage. The plan of making the weekly salary low, and paying the passage, is a good one.

"Wishing you a good voyage, and requesting you ~~to~~ say to Mrs. Wrennys, if I can be of any service to her while you are abroad, she may

I am yours, very respectfully,

(Signed) RICHARD PRINCE, JUNR.

"P.S.—Let me recommend to you to call upon ~~the~~ stars in London, all you think may come here, and tell them not to sell themselves to Price and Co. Put an ~~insertion~~ in the ~~London~~ Messenger, stating what stars get here when they come on their own account. I will send you the materials for this by the packet from New York, which sails the 4th of July. This will break up the New York plans. This will let the ~~big fish~~ come here without Price and Simpson, and, in the end, will do more for Warren's scheme than they ~~can~~ accomplish. You may leave the ~~business~~ certified by Warren's treasurer, with the publisher of the ~~paper~~.

"Ascertain what agreement the stars would make with Warren, to come out here, and he may write them on your return, or [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] have two [redacted] It will give you weight WITH them, give Warren a standing, and make them hesitate to sell themselves to Price."

All [redacted] of [redacted] letter [redacted] afterwards approved by Mr. Warren, in a letter addressed to me in London. It will be seen that [redacted] of the great objects of my visit to England, [redacted] to place [redacted] Chesnut Street Theatre on [redacted] high ground from which it had lately receded, by treating directly with the stars, in London, instead of receiving them, second-hand, through the managers of [redacted] Park Theatre, New York, [redacted] whom [redacted] had become a fashion, to say, "you [redacted] receive Mr., [redacted] Mrs., or Miss [redacted], on [redacted] a day, [redacted] they [redacted] visit Philadelphia [redacted] all." The general break-up in theatricals [redacted] took place in 1829 and 1830, alone prevented the success of [redacted] scheme. Mrs. Sloman's [redacted] induced Mrs. W. [redacted] and Mrs. Vining, to enter [redacted] into terms, which, Warren retiring from the management, prevented [redacted] being [redacted] effect.

XIV.

[redacted] in Liverpool. Meeting of Price and [redacted] Stars [redacted] prospect. Miserable situation of the Provincial Theatres in regard to Talent. Journey to London. An English M. P. Offer of Alliance, Offensive and Defensive, with Dr. Hart, Agent of the Bowery Theatre. [redacted] concluded with Mr. and Mrs. Sloman, [redacted] Austin, Miss George, [redacted] Thompson [redacted] Numerous Engagements. [redacted] Cover [redacted] Ship-load of Actors for Philadelphia. [redacted] Arrival. [redacted] Voyage. Managerial Trouble commencing. [redacted] Opening of the [redacted] 1837 and 1838.

I [redacted] at Liverpool on the 20th July, and on the vessel was made fast to the dock, the first person I [redacted] standing on [redacted] wharf [redacted] Stephen Price, at that time manager of Drury Lane Theatre. He, and James Wallack, were anxiously [redacted]pecting Macready who, I informed them, I [redacted] left acting in Baltimore. They invited me [redacted] with them, [redacted] to hear all the news from America. I promised to see them in the evening, which we spent together, proceeding to the theatre, where I [redacted] old friends, Meadows [redacted] Paul [redacted]

Price declared to [redacted] he had no connection with American theatricals, and knew no one, except Simpson, whom he would [redacted] more happy to serve than Warren, since he had out-acted Mr. Lignum. I [redacted] much [redacted] [redacted] from him, as to the whereabouts of many actors I was anxious to see; but I soon found, on my arrival in London, that Price was still considered the manager of the Theatre, New York; however, I learnt that Mrs. Price might be induced to cross the Atlantic if I could make her an offer worth accepting. Having been an acquaintance of Sloman, when we were together in the Canterbury company, I lost no time in addressing a letter to him, requesting to him as early as possible, after my arrival in London. On the 1st of August we met, and concluded an engagement for one year, for the service of himself and Mrs. Sloman, for which I agreed, on behalf of Mr. Warren, to pay him twenty-seven pounds per week, and allow him all his travelling expenses. This was one of the most important as well as most successful engagements I made.

The demand for theatrical emigration to America was high when I arrived in London. Dr. Hart of New York, had engaged a reinforcement for the Bowery Theatre of that city. The Boston managers were exerting themselves to meet the opposition preparing for them by the Tremont Theatre, of which Pelby the Hallam had engaged nearly an entire season for Walnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia, among whom were Harry and John . . . Applications from of minor reputed flocked in upon me by dozens, employing at least an hour a day to answer. My first to see could be procured in the provincial theatres, was I more disappointed; with the exception of Miss Kenneth, both of Birmingham, and a Mr. Hammond, of Liverpool, there was not an worth making an offer to, and I was determined, if I could not meet with those whom judgment approved, to return to the United without forming any engagements at all.

Booth had strongly recommended to my notice Chapman, as a young man of talent, enquiring after, I fortunately found him in the humour to answer my purpose. His brother William having been engaged the Bowery Theatre, I had difficulty in forming an engagement mutually satisfactory. I agreed to give him pounds per week, which he thought then a liberal offer, although some time after his arrival in the States, although regularly paid, he grumbled exceedingly, because he found others, of more value to the theatre than himself, in receipt of higher emolument.

My next enquiry was after Mr. Southwell, and I must confess my surprise was equal to my pleasure, in finding this dashing Romeo, my old strolling acquaintance, Francis, whom I parted with in Bolton, Lancashire. I had considerable difficulty in prevailing upon him to listen to my proposal; he laughed at the idea; nor do I think ~~my~~ our old friendship would have induced him to listen to ~~my~~ overtures, had ~~he~~ not have had a quarrel with Elliston upon the score ~~of~~ business, when, Irishman-like, acting upon the impulse of the moment, he came directly from the theatre to me, and to prevent possibility of reconciliation, signed his articles before he ~~my~~ lodgings, to ~~me~~ ~~my~~ small gratification, although much to ~~my~~ ~~my~~ of Elliston, who threatened to arrest him for ~~my~~ of contract, if he attempted to sail for America; ~~my~~ poor ~~my~~ ~~my~~ uneasy until he was safely ~~my~~ sea on board the Mont.

~~My~~ ~~my~~ next engaged my attention, a ~~my~~ acquisition to any ~~my~~ I ~~my~~ Rowbotham, and was equally successful. ~~My~~ Emery, of the Surrey Theatre, I was also fortunate enough to engage, and on recounting my recruits, I began to feel proud of my success. A ~~my~~ singer ~~my~~ the only important person I now wanted, ~~my~~ I was completely baffled, ~~my~~ ~~my~~ imposed upon by Fearman, who recommended to me his pupil Hutchings, ~~my~~ that time engaged in the York Theatre. He ~~my~~ the only person to whose talent I was a stranger, until I ~~my~~ committed myself beyond the possibility of retracting, ~~my~~ ~~my~~ as was the bargain, it was Hobson's choice, "that or none." I now turned my attention to a machinist, and material for a good pantomime. ~~My~~ Henry Lewis ~~my~~ recommended to ~~me~~ by Barrymore, a most able mechanic, whose failings rendered his talent ~~my~~ source of mortification more than profit, although he was of great service to the theatre. Master and Miss Kerr, and Miss Hawthorn, together with two young ladies named Minter, who ~~my~~ to make their appearance ~~my~~ the appointed time, Mr. Willis as a melo-dramatic leader, completed ~~my~~ ~~my~~ ments, and with a feeling of pride I wrote to Mr. Warren, informing him of my success in carrying out all his views.

I ~~my~~ received a note ~~my~~ to Mr. Kenneth, from ~~my~~ Hon. F. H. F. Berkeley, requesting ~~my~~ interview, ~~my~~ I ~~my~~ ~~my~~ application from ~~my~~ Austin, which I was ~~my~~ willing ~~my~~ entertain. She was then singing ~~my~~ Vauxhall, where I went to hear her, and was so delighted with her voice, ~~my~~ on ~~my~~ following morning, after a few moments' conversation, I left two proposals ~~my~~ her consideration, to ~~my~~ last of which she replied,—

"Mr. Austin ~~my~~ prepared to accede ~~my~~ engagement ~~my~~ Philadelphia, as proposed by Mr. Wenyon, for ~~my~~ nights, ~~my~~ ~~my~~ pounds sterling ~~my~~ night, ~~my~~ a half clear benefit, to take place ~~my~~ ~~my~~ day, Friday or Saturday excepted; the strength, ~~my~~ part of the company being ~~my~~ Austin's disposal on that night. Mrs. ~~my~~ ~~my~~ appear ~~my~~ Philadelphia (unless ~~my~~ disposed by the voyage) within a week after her arrival; not to play more was the substance of the engagement, which was finally arranged, with the option of a renewal for twelve nights longer, on the part of the manager, on the same terms.

(then three times a week, and to be guaranteed an engagement at Baltimore, sharing with the manager, after the expenses; the amount to be paid for each party each night; the payment either weekly or nightly, as may please the manager."

(COPY OF MR. H. BERKELEY'S NOTE.)

"Mr. H. Berkeley's compliments to Mr. Kenneth, beg to acquaint him, that on Monday he will meet Mr. Wemyss and himself at Mrs. Austin's, at any time Mr. Kenneth may fix, finally to arrange everything. Mr. Berkeley sees no obstacle, but will make every remark on paper, to the most particular lots, for Mrs. Wemyss' approval. Mr. Kenneth will be kind enough to acquaint Mr. W. that Mrs. Austin has got an engagement at either theatre in New York, and appear there first, but that she certainly shall consider herself bound to Mr. Warren, and respecting all other engagements in America, shall make a point to be guided by that which will be most agreeable or useful to the Philadelphia manager.

"Respecting the ten pounds, nightly, Mrs. Austin will be entirely guided by Colonel Berkeley, who arrives on Saturday at Berkeley House, and it was owing to his opinion, that she made the proposal; but it has found much objection in her mind to find Mrs. Wemyss ready to meet the terms, as it clearly proves his good opinion of the venture. In short, Mr. Berkeley merely proposes Monday, because of the arrival of his brother, the necessity of attending to whom, Mr. Kenneth can very well understand."

Here was a great point gained in a negotiation for a star; the Old Street Theatre receiving a preference to either the Park or Bowery Theatres of New York, and through a source which might hereafter be turned to great advantage. The patronage of Colonel Berkeley to theatres and theatricals in London, being too well known to require comment.

was in consequence of this engagement, which was concluded on the Monday, that John Thompson Norton, the trumpeter, par excellence, was engaged to try his fortune in the western world—an acquisition to the orchestra of no small value.

On Tuesday, August 21st, I found the following note upon my table.

"Dr. Hart, of New York, has had the pleasure of waiting on Mrs. Wemyss, on business relative to the Philadelphia Theatre. As it will suit the mutual convenience of Mr. W., Dr. Hart will be glad to see him any time to-morrow, between 12 and 5 o'clock, at his residence, No. 14, Pall Mall.

"Tuesday, Aug. 21, 1837."

I waited upon Dr. Hart at the appointed time; the result was the engagement of Miss George, to appear in Philadelphia.

He made also an offer which I agreed to, subject to the final approval of Mr. Warren, in Philadelphia. It was, if the Bowery Theatre of New York, of which he was the agent in London, would receive such stars as we engaged, on fair and reciprocal terms, that the Philadelphia Theatre would enter into an arrangement to exclude entirely every star known to be imported by Price, Simpson, and our own engagement of Braham and Madame Vestris, for the Bowery and Philadelphia theatres. Dr. Hart further pledged himself, if Warren agreed to this arrangement, that the French Dancers, now on their way to America, or any auxiliary company, which could illustrate the views of the New York manager, in Philadelphia, should be at our disposal, by giving one week's notice. He honestly confessed these offers were not made that they loved us more, but that they hated the Park more.

This was a strong blow aimed at the prosperity of the Park Theatre, which, if the Boston managers, who were also tired of their thralldom, had entered into, would have placed Price and Simpson in the situation of suppliants, rather than the despots which they had hitherto proved.

Gilfert was the first to break this arrangement by an angry publication, stating that Miss George was engaged only for the Bowery Theatre, any other announcement to the contrary notwithstanding, while I had a written engagement in my possession, which, in justification, I published at full length in the newspapers of the day. E. Forrest also, whose movements were dictated by the Bowery manager, to whom he was then engaged, formed another obstacle to the fulfilment of the interests of both theatres, that no good was ultimately gained by either party from preliminaries which promised so fairly.

Had Gilfert acted in good faith, the Park Theatre must have lost the name of the Theatre; for, during the winter of 1827 and 1828, it presented the uncommon spectacle of being dependent, for foreign attraction, entirely upon the importation of other theatres; Clara Fisher and Horn being the only new stars over whom they exercised any control.

My first proposition made to the Bowery Theatre, to exchange stars on fair and reciprocal terms, in person of Mrs. Sloman for E. Forrest; (and every body recollecting about representations knows that my first engagement was a succession of well-chosen houses, the worst of which was better than any house Mr. E. Forrest had ever attracted to the Chestnut Street Theatre, at that time, except on the occasion of his benefit,) was received almost as an insult, both to the lady and the management.

The [redacted] of Dr. Hart's authority to enter into any [redacted] arrangement, and the confidence that followed, healed the breach which was threatened between the Park Theatre and the Chestnut [redacted] Theatre; Mr. Warren being perfectly willing to [redacted] a treaty, offensive and defensive, with the Bowery Theatre, [redacted] by no means anxious merely to change masters, which appeared to be Mr. Giffert's view of the alliance.

On the 8th of September, I embarked at Liverpool, on board the Montesuma, Captain West, on my return to Philadelphia, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Southwell, son and servant; Mr. S. Chapman and brother; Mr. Hetchings; Mr. and Mrs. [redacted], and son; Miss [redacted]; Mr. J. T. Norton; Mr. Willis; Mr., Mrs., and Miss Ker; [redacted] Hawthorn and Miss Worghman; Mr. and Mrs. Lewis, and family; leaving Mr. and Mrs. Bloman; Mrs. Austin; Miss George; Miss Minter; and Mr. and Mrs. Bobotham, to follow as early as possible.

I must do Captain West the justice to say [redacted] made us all as comfortable, as it was possible under the circumstances, to be; a merrier set seldom crossed the Atlantic in company. We had one masquerade, two or three concerts, which, considering the [redacted] talent, were excellent, indeed—better [redacted] an audience assembled on shore paid a dollar per ticket to hear—and several dances, which we must honour with the name of ball; [redacted] tending to make a summer passage a pleasant voyage.

[redacted] the 17th of October, 1827, I [redacted] the ship, [redacted] letter bag, proceeding up to town on the Norfolk steamboat, reported myself to Mr. Warren, found my wife and children in excellent health, and myself once more at my own fire-side. If a man wishes to know the comforts of home, let him be absent three or four months, with a wide expanse of water dividing him from those he holds most dear. It was within one day of four months, since I parted from my wife, during which time I had not been stationary one day; having been either on board a ship, a steamboat, or a mail coach, at some period during each twenty-four hours of my absence from America.

Mr. Davis [redacted] of French [redacted] acting in [redacted] Theatre. [redacted] policy of this movement has been much doubted; certain it is that the fashionable of Philadelphia mustered so strong in their support, that Mr. Davis was induced to repeat his visit each succeeding summer; but it had a most sinister effect upon the opening of the English season. Notwithstanding Mr. Warren had expended between five and six thousand dollars for auxiliary aid, the band having been augmented by recruits from Germany, under the direction of Mr. Braun, making the orchestra the the most complete ever assembled within the walls of an American theatre, yet the receipts of the first week fell short of the nightly expenditure. It was not until the production of "Evadne," and the "Rencontre," that the season began to assume a favourable appearance, and was brought to a most successful close.

On the 10th of October, a concert was given, to introduce new talent with eclat; and I was in great satisfaction of hearing them all alone encored. I looked upon it as a favourable omen, and received many congratulations from my friends.

On the 15th of October, we announced to open on the 20th, with "Romeo and Juliet," and "Is He Jealous," to give Mr. Southwell an opportunity of appearing in Romeo. I soon discovered that the stage manager's situation was not to be envied. I was more than ever engaged upon the subject of Miss Warren playing Juliet.

Southwell, however, made quite a success of Romeo, Miss Warren, notwithstanding all the hints of secret foes, played Juliet very prettily. On the following evening Mr. Mercer and Mr. Hutchings made their bow; the former gentleman becoming once a decided favourite. Mr. Chapman made his appearance as Pierre, in "Venice Preserved," under unfavourable circumstances; Wood having been announced for the part, but unable from sickness to play. Mr. Emery played the Belvidera. Mr. Norton made his first appearance. The houses during these preliminary arrangements were very bad, but on the production of "Evadne," in which, for the first time, all the strangers were placed before the public in one play, curiosity filled the house, and from that moment prosperity began to dawn. At the conclusion of the play Mr. Warren publicly returned me thanks for the able manner in which I had accomplished my mission.

The next successful step was the production of a new comedy, "The Rencontre," which, with "Evadne," was played several nights. The non-arrival of Mrs. Austin, as expected, by the Robert Edwards, had left me in uncertainty as to my movements with regard to stars; therefore, it was fortunate that the public appreciated the efforts of our really good stock company.

On the 14th of September Mr. Charles Horn made his first appearance in Philadelphia, as Young Montano, in "Love in a Village," Mrs. Knight playing Rosetta; although the first stars of the season, they were not very successful.

On the 26th, I received the following letter from the Hon. F. H. F. Berkeley:—

"Algonquin," (at sea,) Sunday, Nov. 24th, 1827.

"My Dear Sir,

"Mrs. Austin, Mrs. Sloman, and Mr. Sloman, are here, all in health, as well as

"Yours, truly,

(Signed) "F. H. F. Satterley."

This was a weight removed from my mind, although it was unfortunate; [redacted] two stars, from whom I expected most, arriving in the [redacted] vessel. [redacted] Mrs. Austin have come, [redacted] [redacted] by the Robert Edwards, the money paid to Mrs. [redacted] and Mrs. Knight would have been saved [redacted] the treasury, and her own reception would have been more to her satisfaction. [redacted] made her first appearance in America, at [redacted] Theatre, December 10th, 1827.

This lady, who became so popular in New York, as the first representative of Cinderella in the United States, and who, in conjunction with Mr. Jones, [redacted] English Opera fashionable, was [redacted] by me in London for the Chestnut-street Theatre, Philadelphia. She made her first appearance as Rosetta, in "Love in a Village;" [redacted] brilliant [redacted] which she executed the music at once established [redacted] reputation as a singer of more than ordinary talent, but the taste for music and the opera was in its infancy; to Mr. Warren belongs the credit of its cultivation. The excellent orchestra of the year 1827 and 1828, provided for the Chestnut-street Theatre, deserves a better fate than to be [redacted] throughout the Union. Three years later, such music within [redacted] walls [redacted] theatre, would have formed no inconsiderable portion of [redacted] evening's attraction.

Mrs. [redacted] Austin's engagement, although rich in reputation, [redacted] a failure in the most important matter to the manager, "money." Every body who heard her sing, praised her; but circumstances, beyond the control of the theatre, and an unmanly attack in the columns of a newspaper, to gratify the feelings of parties who must not be mentioned, induced the ladies to absent themselves on the nights of her performance. This prejudice, unjustly fostered against her at a later period, she entirely surmounted, and became a great favourite. She played Rosetta, Lucy Bertram, Rosina, Margaretta, Florence St. Leon, Diana Vernon, Mary O'Connell, and for her benefit revived Dr. Ames's opera of "Artaxerxes," in which she gave the music of Mandane with splendid effect; Mercer playing Artabanus; Hutchings, Arbaces; Miss E. Jefferson, Artaxerxes; and Mrs. Darley, Irene. I question if the opera was ever better performed in America than on this occasion. She proceeded to New York, where she became a reigning favourite, assisted by Horn and Mr. Pearman—repairing the wound Mrs. Sloman's success had inflicted upon her vanity, and turning the tables as far as attraction was concerned, decidedly in her favour.

XV.

Mrs. Sloman's First Appearance in America. Great Reception. Good Generalship. Ridiculous Habits. Mrs. Austin. E. Forrest. Play of the "Umpire." Grand Fire Up. After Thunder, Clear Weather Again.

7th of December, 1827, was a day of anxiety. On that evening Mrs. Sloman made her first appearance as Isabella, in the "Fatal Marriage." To me her success or failure was a matter of great importance; for, as my first star imported for the Philadelphia Theatre, our future exertions would be guided by her reception. She was an old acquaintance; her husband had been an intimate companion, in the happiest days of my strolling career. Mr. Warren was pledged, through me, to pay her twenty pounds sterling per week, for one year; it cannot, therefore, be a matter of surprise that I exerted myself to the utmost in her favour, that I filled the theatre full of fears for the result, with one hope, so splendidly realized, that she might please the audience.

The pit was only indifferently filled, but the pit was overflowing, and her success triumphant.

Mrs. SLAMAN

produced a greater sensation, and drew more money for thirteen successive nights, than any star who had hitherto graced the boards of the Chestnut Street Theatre. She was a compound of wit and beauties, in the art of acting—so blundered that it was at times difficult to say whether her performance was really good, or very bad, but it seldom failed to please her audience.

When I first knew her, in Canterbury, in 1818, she was, as Miss Whitaker, a pretty and a clever girl, playing singing chambermaids, in which she was a great favourite; she then became the wife of Mr. Henry Dowton, (the manager's son,) and by her kindness and attention to his comfort, during a long and tedious illness, acquired the estimation of all who knew her. Some years after his death she became the wife of Mr. John Sloman, and made her appearance as a tragic actress, [redacted] success, at Covent Garden Theatre. Her reputation, [redacted] by the recommendation of Mr. Price, induced me [redacted] offer, on behalf of the Philadelphia Theatre, [redacted] hand accepted. On the first night of her appearance in America, very few ladies graced the boxes, but the impression made upon the audience, in the character of Isabella, was so favourable that at an early hour on the following morning the doors were besieged by an anxious crowd, waiting to secure places in the boxes, which, on her second appearance, were filled to overflowing, and so continued during her engagement. The receipts of her first performance were two hundred dollars less than any subsequent representation. The thirteen nights produced ten thousand six hundred and thirty dollars and seventy-five cents, or 817 dollars 75 cents per night—a result most gratifying to me and satisfactory to Mr. Warren, who again thanked me, by Judge Hopkinson, for the able manner in which he was pleased to say I had discharged my commission.

Mrs. Sloman played Isabella, Mrs. Haller, Belvidera; Jane Shore; Juliet, Mrs. Oakley, Lady Townley; repeating several [redacted] the characters by request. In "Jane Shore," where Miss Emery, (who had become an [redacted] favourite) played Allice, there was quite an animated contest for superiority—Mr. Matthew Carey, whose opinion was of some value in such matters, openly declaring his preference for Miss Emery, who was a valuable actress. The difference of opinion was of service to the treasury.

Mrs. Sloman left us, for the Federal Street Theatre, in Boston, where [redacted] not [redacted] her efforts; while in the Park Theatre, New York, Simpson proved for once a good general, by crushing her [redacted] superior [redacted], on the nights on which she did not appear: [redacted] Horn, Mr. [redacted] Austin, playing together [redacted] nights a week, while Mrs. Sloman, unsupported, occupied the other three.

With her first success terminated her attraction. So flake is the public mind, that on her return to Philadelphia, before the close of the season, she could not attract a single dollar. The same thing occurred to Clara Fisher, [redacted] [redacted] ment was only eclipsed by Mrs. Sloman's.

Mr. Sloman made his bow to an American audience, on the occasion [redacted] his wife's benefit, December 17th. His comic singing proved very attractive, giving a fresh impetus to [redacted] desire of the audience for a re-engagement of Mrs. [redacted]. Mr. Sloman's acting, having the advantage of many original parts, was considered good by many critics; however, I cannot pronounce it so. His singing was excellent; and in [redacted] alone consisted the secret of his great benefits throughout the United States. It was only from this source in New York that the engagement of Mr. Mrs. Sloman paid Mr. Warren.

While upon the subject of New York theatricals, managers there have a habit of announcing pieces in representation for the first time in America, which have frequently been played in Philadelphia, deceiving only themselves by the trick, and provoking comparisons by no means favourable to their managerial enterprise. As thus: a Philadelphian visits New York, inquires for a play bill, sees a piece thus announced, and naturally enough says, "Why, have you not seen that, yet? your managers must have been asleep; it has been acted in our city six months ago."

Mr. Austin having proceeded to New York, the nights vacated were assigned to Mr. E. Forrest, on condition that he should return and finish the engagement, on the 26th of March. He appeared as Brutus, in Howard Payne's tragedy, on the 22d of January, but the houses were indifferently attended; but it must be remembered at this time Mr. Forrest had not acquired the fame which afterwards enabled him to dictate terms to managers. He was climbing the hill with rapid strides, but not toward the summit.

On the 26th of December, 1827, the long announced tragedy of the "Usurper," written by Dr. M'Henry, was produced. Ere I speak of its reception by the public, let me state that Dr. M'Henry cast his characters himself, selecting whom he thought best qualified to give him support. I record this, to show the feeling which existed towards him as an author, and the disposition of the management to give him every facility in their power, which could contribute to his success.

The Doctor received an assurance, that so long as the tragedy would draw a nightly incidental to the performances, (800 dollars,) it should be repeated. The newspapers were zealous in their endeavours to aid his cause, and a writer in the Saturday Post went so far as to say, "In Europe, on a piece being more than commonly successful, it was the practice of the audience to call for its repetition by name." Here the cue of action was distinctly given. The night of performance arrived. The prologue, written by James S. Barker, Esq., led to my lot. I gave the dramatic report; for since that eventful night, the infant, whose death is announced in the prologue, which incident had nearly upset the gravity of the spectators, was grown up and become a talker on his own behalf; whether the play be improved by the alteration, I leave those who witnessed its performance, and (since the Doctor's assurance "to print it, and show the fools") have had courage to read it, to decide.

THE USURPER.

(The Usurper) Mr. Southwell; Labra, King of
 ster, Mr. Brown; Mahon, (rightful heir to the throne) Mr.
 Mercer; Partholon, Mr. B. Chapman; Arch Druid, (confident to Cobla) Mr. Wood; Connal, Mr. Heyl; Athmore, Mr.
 Hathwell; Harmed, Mr. Drummond; Cathal, Mr. Darl; Olansagh, Mr. [redacted]ey; First Chief, Mr. Parker;
 Chief, Mr. Murray; Third Chief, Mr. Delarue; [redacted] Soldier, Mr. Klett; Second Soldier, Mr. Lyons; Third Soldier, Mr.
 Bengall; First Bard, Mr. Hutchings; Second Bard, Mr. [redacted] son; Priestess, Miss Emory; Elifnor, Miss Warren; Moreast, Miss Darley; Servant, Mr. Hathwell

[redacted] composed expressly for the piece by [redacted] [redacted]

[redacted] Prologue written by James S. Barker, Esq. to [redacted] spoken by [redacted] Wemyss.

PROLOGUE.

From that romantic Isle, whose emerald plains
 In smiling verdure, hide their emerald stains;
 The land of heroes, and by patriots trod,
 The land of lovers, and the bard's abode.
 From Erin borne on poetry's magic wing,
 The chiefs of other days we hither bring,
 To claim within this hospitable dome,
 A stranger's welcome, in a stranger's home,
 The poet of the scene, who trembling woe,
 To-night the favour of the tragic muse,
 Though not unknown to you, his tuneful page,
 For the first time presents to tread the stage;
 And conscious of the peril, suppliant bends
 Before a jury of indulgent friends.
 Not his the strain, where sabbings numbers flow,
 And turgid diction speaks seditious woe;
 In nature's language he essays the art,
 To reach the judgment, and to touch the heart.
 From the historic page his theme he draws,
 [redacted] days when Erin dared give Erin laws.
 What time the sage's voice and soldier's call,
 And bard's proud anthem rung through Tara's Hall;
 While Erin's priests yet held their Druid rites,
 And Erin's warriors dared for Erin fight.
 Our poet's pencil paints the moral scene,
 Teaching what ought to be, by what has been.
 Lo! the red friar's robe, whose regal vest,
 Claps scorpion conscience closer to his breast;
 Or the arch hypocrite, whose holy guile,
 Cheats, for a season only, mortal eyes:
 Hur'd from a [redacted] or from the altar driv'n;
 [redacted] scene'd of men, condemnation of [redacted]

While in the patriot prince, and faithful maid,
And generous friend, the living truths portrayed.
That virtue, friendship, and unspotted love,
On earth revered, draw blessings from above.
Such was the genuine drama's moral school,
The drama scored by bigot and by fool;
When with the energy of wisdom fraught,
The Addisons, and Steeles, and Johnsons taught.
And though to-night, we boast no golden names,
Like theirs, bright sparkling on the scroll of fame,
Let the endeavour to uphold the laws
Of the pure drama, and great virtue's cause,
Secure the patient hearing for our bard,
The candid judgment, and the just reward.

It has been for Dr. M'Henry's cause, but half the merit of this prologue. Notwithstanding the exertions of my friends, I witnessed a more complete It is true, that as the curtain fell, many young men, fond of making a noise, and delighting in the prospect of a theatrical row, vociferously called for the author, and a repetition of the play, which I promised for the following Thursday, announcing it in the play bill as follows:

"The Usurper having been unanimously called for by the audience at its first representation, will be played again on Thursday next."

For this, I received the thanks of the author, and, until the termination of the next performance, I enjoyed every thing that gratitude could make me; I even received a present from one of the author's poems, accompanied with, "from my friend, Dr. M'Henry," written by his own hand, and on the second night, producing more than the amount of my expenses, released me from all promises, and turned the gratitude of Dr. M'Henry to gall; in an hour I was transformed from one of the worst of the worst of human beings.

The play of the Usurper had been accepted for representation by Mr. Warren, previous to my return to England; the hope of success was kindled by Dr. M'Henry a remuneration. I now presented a third representation, for the benefit of the author, founding his claims on the usages of the large theatres, in London. To this arrangement, many objections presented themselves; one of the greatest magnitude was, the night whited was pre-occupied. Mr. Matthew Carey, whose philanthropy frequently got the better of his judgment, prevailed upon Mr. Warren to let the author have the boon desired, he giving security for three hundred dollars. Having performed my duty to the author and the public, I did not feel inclined to let the responsibility of this performance rest upon me : but without any intention of wounding Dr. M'Henry's feelings, I announced his benefit in the following notice :—

"In consequence of the persevering and unceasing application of Dr. M'Henry and his friends, the tragedy of the Usurper will be played for the third and last time at this theatre, on Friday, the 1st of February, for the benefit of the author."

My only object, in this announcement, was to prove to those who were weary of frequenting this theatre—to whom the play was really obnoxious—that it was the author's doing, not the manager's. I was therefore surprised to read in the United States Gazette of the 30th of January, 1828, the following :—

"TO THE MANAGER"

"It is well-known to the play-going portion of the inhabitants of Philadelphia, that a new tragedy of my composition, has recently been twice performed at the Chestnut Street Theatre, and that it has on several occasions the approbation of the audience. A few days after the second representation, I was induced by the numerous inquiries that were made at my house by respectable individuals, relative to the time when a third representation, which it was supposed would be for my benefit, would take place, to apply to the managers for information. To this application, Mr. Wemyss replied in a style of ambiguity, which seemed to require from him a verbal explanation. This he gave in so abrupt a manner, that I resolved to hold no more communication with him. One of my friends, however, conceiving that I was unjustly treated, took up the matter, and pressed upon the managers the propriety of allowing me a benefit. Friday evening was in consequence set apart for the purpose. In appropriating to me that evening, I considered the managers to be acting towards me not only with good faith, but with good will, and I looked forward to the promised benefit for some remuneration for my labours.

"With these feelings, what was my surprise, when going on Monday night into the theatre, I found the intended performance of 'The Usurper' announced, in a manner and in terms, highly insulting to my friends and to myself, and calculated to destroy all my prospects of profit from a benefit. In consequence of the persevering and unceasing application of Dr. M'Henry and his friends, the tragedy of 'The Usurper' will be played for the third and last time at this Theatre, on Thursday next, February 1st, for the benefit of the author."

"Comment on the evident design and tendency of such an announcement is unnecessary. It might be observed, however, that the foregoing statement affords a positive contradiction to the assertion, that I had made persevering and unceasing applications for a benefit; I had, in fact, never applied but once.

"Under these circumstances, I hope an allowable degree of self-respect will be admitted by those who are desirous to witness another representation of 'The Usurper,' as an apology for my prohibiting that representation, which I have done, in a note addressed to Mr. Warren.

"From the sympathy and support of a generous and enlightened public—the public of Philadelphia—from whom I have never failed to receive justice and kindness, if I were to seek for justice in any instance, I know I should find it. Many magnanimous minds would find pleasure in taking [redacted] with an [redacted] so clearly ill treated, and in teaching arbitrary managers of theatres, that they ought not altogether to disregard the approbation of a community, which [redacted] never approve of injustice and oppression. But I am no [redacted]; my fellow-citizens, I am persuaded, will continue to [redacted] towards me that good will, which I have experienced from them, and which forms, at this moment, my pride as well as my consolation.

"Jan. [redacted] (Signed) [redacted]

Here is as pretty a piece of incendiarianism as [redacted] emanated from the pen of mortal man; the object decidedly "a row."

Dr. M'Henry asserts to the public that [redacted] application for a benefit. Mark his own words: "not content with [redacted] to [redacted] application, he sought a personal interview, and [redacted] resolved to hold no further communication with me: but (mark this) his friends conceived he was unjustly treated, and from his statement it appears, they took [redacted] the subject, which he had resolved to abandon, and pressed upon the managers the propriety of allowing me a benefit."

But—nonsense! If he had not urged the matter, few of his friends would have cared a straw about either the Usurper, or the theatre; and if [redacted] be not perseverance for the attainment of an object, I am at a loss to know what it is.

But to dismiss the Doctor and his tragedy, on whom I [redacted] already wasted too much space.

On the evening following the 1st of February, the night originally appropriated for the author's benefit, previous to the play of "The Wonder," a placard reading thus:—

"Usurper.

Benefit

For the Author,"

was placed in my hands, which was freely distributed in the front of the theatre. Now, what will an enlightened and liberal public say of the [redacted] who, after publicly relinquishing his right to a benefit, should take such [redacted] to ob[redacted] The late Samuel Chapman very facetiously [redacted] placard, thus:—

"The Public is respectfully informed that the

"Usurper

declines taking [redacted]

Benefit

[redacted] Henry being ashamed of putting
For the Author."

In which state it remained in the green room for several days, and was enjoyed, even by the Doctor's friends, as an ~~amusement~~ ~~game~~.

This was the first time I had incurred the displeasure of the audience, as a manager; and never, in any case, was it less deserved. I had performed more than my duty to the author; I had devoted my time, and Mr. Warren had expended his money, on a thankless speculation.

Dr. McHenry has since thought proper to alter his first handling, in terms the Usurper, and produced it at the Arch Street Theatre, where its reception was less successful; and nothing can rescue it from the oblivion to which it is now consigned, with the pleasing recollection to the author, being twice damned; although in his preface he asserts it was received by two audiences, at the Chestnut Street Theatre with every mark of approbation, and only withdrawn because he considered the conduct of the acting manager, (meaning me,) to be grossly insulting towards himself and his friends; although in doing so, he was aware of making a ~~statement~~ of his ~~own~~ ~~conduct~~.

"Nil fuit tam duplicem."

I have proved that every ~~man~~ was ~~made~~ by him to reap, if possible, the pecuniary advantage, although to, and the most unfair means resorted to, to make the public aid his design. His attempt to create a disturbance in the theatre failed; but the first fruits of his bitter enmity were severely ~~paid~~ by me in my position as manager.

The old story of slighting native talent, (native talent, in this instance, at least, born in Ireland,) and treating American disrespect, ~~was~~ revived; some persons carrying their malignity so far as to ~~advise~~ me of having forbidden the orchestra to play the national air, nightly called for by the audience.

To shield myself from this wantonly and insidious attack, I was compelled to address the public, at the end of my play-bills, which I did on the 3rd of February, thus:—

TO THE PUBLIC.

"A report being in circulation, that I had forbidden the orchestra to play the National Air, I beg leave respectfully to inform the public, that so far from forbidding them, I have frequently given orders that ~~the same~~ or more should be played every evening; and from this date, the following arrangement will take place previous to the commencement of the play:—The band will perform the overture of the piece, or such overture as the leader of the orchestra may see fit to substitute. Between the play and the farce, each night, the time will be exclusively appropriated to

NATIONAL AIRS.

I trust this arrangement will prove satisfactory to all parties, and at once disprove the monstrous calumny. It is my sincere wish, and Mr. War-man's interest, that every individual who contributes in the slightest degree to the support of the theatre, should leave, if possible, perfectly satisfied with the evening's amusement,

"THEATRE, 1838, 1839, 1840"

"F. C. WHEAT,
"Manager."

order, publicly given, annoyed poor Braun, the leader, who could not endure the frequent repetition of "Yankee Doodle," to the exclusion of Mozart, Weber, &c.; entering the national feeling, which is the agreeable American

I do not blame Dr. M'Henry or his friends, circulating reports; but it is an unfortunate coincidence, that the accusation in the newspapers appeared simultaneously with Dr. M'Henry's appeal; and since the fracas about Harry Herbert, a predilection for England and her institutions been received as my creed. Love of my country is implanted by nature in our bosoms, and I warmly plaud it, wherever met. I have from misrepresentation, I admire that feeling of patriotism, will brook even a gross insult from the lips of a foreigner. I have always regarded the institutions of America with pride, while I never from defending my England, when unjustly feelings England better expressed, than in slightly altering the toast of a worthy Irish baronet, farce of the "Sleep-Walker." Speaking of England,

"May the gentlemen your country, and mine, altercation, but in good humour, over a bottle." should feeling of every Englishman towards an American, every American towards an Englishman.

CHAPTER XVI.

Miss George. Miss Kelly. Miss Clara Fisher. Lilliputian the Third. Red Rover. Excellent Prologues. Loud Talking of a third Theatre. The Divine Celeste. Actors' Benefits. Colonel attempt at Acting. Mr. Cooper's Return from England. Forrest and Cooper in the same Play. Opera. Appearance of Mr. and Mrs. Rowbotham in America. Elopement. Spirit of Brush at the Third Heat. The Chestnut as it Again. Victorious. The Gnome King vs. Sleeping Beauty. Close of a most Splendid Season.

10th of January, Miss George, of whom as much said, appearance in Philadelphia, in the opera of the "Marriage of Figaro." She was much to Mrs. Austin, as a singer; attracting but little notice, except in the petite comedy of "Twas I, or the Truth a Lie," in which she sang "The B. Breastknobs," much to the satisfaction of the audience. Kelly played a very successful engagement, commencing on the 2nd of February, with Donna Violante in the "Wonder." On the 17th of February, quite a novelty was placed before the audience, in the form of a new opera, by Kotzebue, in German, in which Mr. Mercer, were particularly happy. The overture was performed entirely by French horns, and was enthusiastically encored.

On Wednesday, the 10th of February, 1828, Roy's comedy of "The Will," was performed, for the purpose of introducing

MISS OLGA FISHER

Although in France, "the children's theatre" frequently produces an extraordinary juvenile actor, precocious talent has rarely met with success in England or the United States, where people generally have something of more importance to occupy their time, than listening to children assuming the garb and manner of men and women.

Master Betty, the Roscius, so termed; the young lady whose name I am recording; and Master Burke, musical talent enlisted public curiosity in their favour, as exceptions to this general rule.

Miss Clara Fisher, when only six years of age, was indeed a rare case; and the judicious manner in which she was placed before the public, aided her success. In Lord Flinnip, her assumption of the character of Richard the Third, surrounded by her pigmy warriors, was perfect; the performance of a Lilliputian, it was faultless; as a child apeing a man, it would have been ridiculous. No child was better schooled, or reflected more credit on her preceptor; her powers of imitation were carefully developed, exciting the wonder of the people of London, who pronounced her a Kean in miniature.

But all other instances of precocity, premature decay follows; either the public is too exacting, or the mind of the juvenile player breaks down from over-action, ere it reaches maturity—there being no case on record of a child acquiring popularity in early age who retained it after life. When Miss Clara Fisher first visited the United States, her youth and reputation drew crowds to visit the theatre whenever her name was announced. Now, how changed her destiny—surpassed by many who, in her early career, never thought of approaching her in the favour of the public.

I can scarcely conceive a more painful situation to an individual possessing a sensitive mind, than the consciousness of having made a retrograde movement in public opinion at the very time his utmost exertions have been used to maintain a position which all conceded him entitled to. Yet how few escape this mortification, who commence at the top round of the ladder of [redacted] Neglected as Clara Fisher now is, her name will descend among the few who have arrived [redacted] eminence, [redacted] those who enjoy a short-lived triumph, from her supposed humiliation, will be forgotten. By her exertions, a large family have been respectably educated, and [redacted] lished in life, while in private society, no one in the whole profession is more universally esteemed. This must be her consolation in retirement, [redacted] that fortune which [redacted] ought [redacted] possessed.

Her first engagement in Philadelphia averaged upwards of seven hundred dollars per night, out of which [redacted] received nearly four thousand dollars; but as, in the case of Mrs. Sloman, when she returned, all curiosity to see her had subsided; nor [redacted] I remember that she ever afterwards played a profitable engagement in Philadelphia—that is, profitable to the treasury of the theatre. Her Four Mowbrays will long be remembered as a finished specimen of comic acting.

Mr. Burroughs played a night or two; but [redacted] houses, after [redacted] great business we had been acting to, appeared really worse than they [redacted].

On the 21st of February, the " [redacted] Rover" [redacted] produced. [redacted] Carey and Lea, the spirited booksellers [redacted] publishers, having announced Cooper's new novel of [redacted] "Red Rover" as nearly ready for delivery, I thought struck me, that if a copy of the novel could be procured, in [redacted] of the publication, and a nautical drama founded upon it, it would [redacted] productive both of reputation [redacted] money.

I waited upon these gentlemen, who, in the kindest manner, granted my request, stipulating only that it should not be seen by [redacted] person except those concerned in our preparations. With my prize in my possession, I returned triumphantly to the theatre. I offered Mr. S. Chapman twenty dollars a night, for every night it should be acted, if he would compile a drama, (for which he possessed an apt talent,) such [redacted] should [redacted] [redacted] approbation, from the "Red Rover," retaining such [redacted] as I pointed out—the moving panorama being intended for the great scene, as a novelty. Here was a field for manager, author, painter, and machinist; and well did each acquit themselves, [redacted] forgetting [redacted] excellent [redacted] [redacted] Braun. Never [redacted] any theatre was a more successful piece produced; enabling us to act on the Tuesday and Thursday nights to five hundred dollars per night, against the brilliant success of Miss Clara Fisher. The Prologue, written by Richard Penn

Smith, was spoken [redacted] much order, by H. Chapman and myself, in our chambers of Author and Manager.—Let it speak for [redacted]

[redacted] THE "RED ROVER."

Spoken by Mr. Wemyss and Mr. [redacted] Chapman; written by R. P. Smith, Esq.

ENTER THE MANAGER, FOLLOWED BY [redacted]

MANAGER.—Another author! what is this you say, Another author, with another play,
Who vows with all the rosiest of rage,
That I must forthwith bring it on the stage;
The fellow's mad—stark mad—to brave the town,
And [redacted] of arms, force his rubbish down;
But show him in—(exit boy); they shall not make me fear
Tho' authors now like Banquo's race, appear
A moment, and then vanish.

(Enter author.)—Sir, your most—

A virgin author, to give up the ghost.

AUTHOR.—You're wrong, my friend, my drama;—(offers MS.)

MANAGER.—Let me see!

AUTHOR.—We'll charm the town, and fill your treasury.

MANAGER.—A modest youth—the town—I understand; [redacted] genius-like, you write a d—d cramp'd hand,
Which I cannot decypher;—Sir, no doubt
You can explain what this is all about.

AUTHOR.—The title will explain; there—there, turn over;
One leaf speaks volumes.

MANAGER.—(Reading.)—"The Red Rover."
[redacted] cunning rogue, the critics to confound, [redacted] builds his false on another's ground;
But let us hear what arguments you bring,
By way of recommending this strange thing.

AUTHOR.—Our scenes are drawn from Cooper's graphic page, Sufficient passport, surely, to the stage.
Sublime his tale—in beauty o'er profane;
Yet yielding little to the Drama's mean.
For these descriptions, which with nature vie,
The painter's brush but feebly can supply;
Yet much depends upon the painter's art;
And how—the plane—and saw—perform their part.
So critics who uphold the stage-rite,
May close their ears, and shut their eyes to-night.

MANAGER.—Zounds! how is this?

AUTHOR.—Be patient, you shall see,
A scene to tickle the catastrophe;
"One," as Flays says, "shall set the madman mad,
And pit, and box, and gallery fit, and
With anything extant."

MANAGER.—(Surprised.)—You mean to say, [My] hammer, paint, and boards, [my] [my] [my]

AUTHOR.—Precisely so.

MANAGER.—And [my] it chances to [my]
 Of course you'll buy a claim to toast and wit.

AUTHOR.—You're right again.

—Modest,—but [my] it fails—

AUTHOR.—Well! [my] the carpenter, the boards [my] [my] [my] impossible—impossible.

MANAGER.—Indeed!

AUTHOR.—My [my] is a darling, 'twill succeed,
 [my] showy [my] from a [my] tale,
 [my] fair city, [my] was [my] to fail.

MANAGER.—We'll try [my] point.

AUTHOR.—Perhaps 'twill [my] the [my]
 The "Rover"—what I already on [my] stage—
 This looks like expedition, cries that [my],
 While sauntering in the lobby, to and fro,
 A wish to please the town; egad! that's right—
 A native play—I'll take a box to-night.

MANAGER.—To please the town, has been, I here declare,
 My proudest study, [my] my hourly care;
 And when I prove imperfect in the part,
 The fault lies here; (touching his head,) but [my] [my]
 [my] the heart.
 The wish to please, at least all must allow:
 [my] "Rover," [my] be done—so make your bow.

Exeunt together.

Lewis, for his [my] of sinking the Carolina, and [my] arrangement of the deck [my] Dart, with the whole plan of his panorama, deserved and received unqualified approbation, both [my] and behind the curtain. The [my] produced [my] audience by [my] first representation, [my] capital. [my] ing [my] by surprise, many declared [my] ship [my] positively in motion, [my] optical delusion practised being [my] perfectly arranged.

[my] incident only occurred, which might have ruined [my] [my] At [my] night rehearsal for the scenery, everything had succeeded beyond my most sanguine expectations; when [my] S. Chapman, [my] by the approbation bestowed on his exertions, suddenly said, "Mr. Weary, expend fifty [my] more, [my] I will [my] you; I will [my] a shower [my] rain [my] [my] audience to look [my] umbrellas; but I [my] have three gauze [my] [my] I never [my] but one good effect by [my] (the dream [my] of "Cherry and Fair Star,") I hesitated; when, with his characteristic humour, he said, "Don't spoil our ship at last, for a half-penny worth of tar; let me have my way; if it don't succeed, I will pay for it myself." Mr. Warren, who was within hearing, and pleased with the appearance of success, which every thing promised, out; "Let [ ] have it, Wenyan." [ ] was given, [ ] on [ ] following evening, the rain [ ] [ ] applause from [ ] audience,—enveloping the boat, in which Wilder and his lady companions were [ ], in a dense fog, in which they were likely to remain. The effect not having been tried, no means was provided for removing the unfortunate gauge, and the rain, after having performed its part to admiration, had to ascend again to the skies, amid the laughter of the audience, and the mortification of the author. The stirring incident of the piece restored the good humour of the audience; but the shower of rain was dispensed with in the future representations. Southwell, by his refusal to act the part of Wilder, fixed upon me a most unpleasant duty, which prevented that attention to many minor details, which would not have occurred had I been out of the dramatic personæ. As we contrived to sink a ship, covering it with foaming billows, surely we could have removed my friend Chapman's shower of rain, without the necessity of restoring it to the clouds.

It was in the month of February or March, 1828, that Mr. M'Geary, a bookseller, from the city of New York, issued proposals to erect a new theatre in Philadelphia. The location chosen was in Arch street, near the corner of the 6th street. After all the preliminary arrangements were agreed upon, Mr. M'G. either could not or would not, give the security demanded by the subscribers of the stock, for the fulfilment of his promises: and the project would have been abandoned had not Mr. W. B. Wood stepped forward with an offer to proceed, which was accepted, in the sequel, ruining him, and every other manager who was unfortunate enough to occupy it. It was built by Mr. Strickland, the architect of the Chesnut Theatre, but he did not improve upon the model of [ ] latter [ ]. Wood took his [ ] benefit at the [ ] [ ] Theatre, on the 14th of April. "Adelgitha" and "Mr. H." [ ] the pieces selected. [ ] the close of the performance, the audience [ ] loudly for Mr. Wood, who addressed them in his usual happy manner. To do him justice, I never saw a man who made an extemporary address with a better grace, or possessed so happy a facility of moulding an audience to his own peculiar views.

Miss Rock, the first failing star of the season, appeared at Letitia Hardy and Jenny Transit. She was a clever actress, but her appearance was by no means prepossessing, and the manner in [ ] she dressed, so ancient, compared with [ ] dashing Miss Kelly, that she excited little or no [ ] the audience.

Colato—the divine La Bayadere, whose career has been one of _____ fortunate in the annals of _____ American Drama, made her _____ appearance, on the 18th of March, _____ the Chestnut Street, in a Grand Pae Reul. Her poetry of motion was not at _____ time appreciated: and when she appeared as Myrtillo, in the "Broken Sword," her acting _____ more mirth than sympathy. Who can forget her exclamation of "My father's murderer," and repress a smile _____ the _____ playbills—"Celeste in a speaking character." _____ husband, Mr. Henry Elliott, very _____ discovered the _____ of _____ was not so much in appearing before an audience, as in preparing that audience for her reception by the puff preliminary; and by his judicious newspaper arrangements, succeeded in placing _____ foremost in _____ of those whom managers were anxious to engage, because their engagements were always profitable to _____ theatre. _____ popularity remained undiminished to the _____ hour of _____ appearance on the American stage; and the announcement of her name, at any _____, will secure a well filled house.

_____ of March, Mr. R. Forrest was announced to not _____, _____ New York, _____ Philadelphia. _____ being _____ the power of ubiquity, he remained _____ Boston, _____ placed in a two-fold dilemma. Having _____ gaged Mr. Forrest to finish _____ of nights _____ time, _____ make _____ arrangement without violation of contract, while Mr. Gilfert (for I _____ do _____ justice _____ think it _____ his arrangement) did not condescend to inform the management of the change which _____ place in his views. _____ Philadelphia _____ a loss _____ a _____ have been profitably employed; and disappearance was prevented by an announcement in the playbills, that _____ Mr. _____ Forrest arrive, as expected, he would appear, but _____ "Red Rover" would _____ Thus _____ adroitly avoided the possibility of incurring _____ displeasure of _____ audience on _____ sensitive point _____ native talent, leaving _____ matter to be settled by Mr. Forrest and _____ audience when they next met.

The _____ of the _____ were very well attended _____ W. Chapman, a very good comedian, acted Crack for _____ brother Samuel's benefit. Miss Southwell aided her brother in the opera of Malvina, while Mr. McCahen made a second attempt _____ Mr. Brown's benefit; but _____ makes a _____ better politician than an actor; _____ first appearance _____ Young Norval, on the 29th of January; _____ which he played Murdock Delany, in the "Irishman in London." On the 25th of April, Mr. Cooper made his first appearance in Macbeth, on _____ return from England, after his _____ successful attempt on the London stage. The house was crowded to give him a welcome. One of those occurrences sometimes take place in a theatre, produced much amusement, but robbed Mr. Cooper of half of the [ ] of [ ] reception. Mr. Brown, who played a minor part, appearing on the bridge from whence Cooper was expected, [ ] mistaken for him, and received [ ] with [ ] by the audience, who, when they discovered [ ] mistake, [ ] joyed a hearty laugh [ ] the expense of poor Brown's feelings, [ ] was only interrupted by the [ ] [ ] favourite, who received their acclamations with much [ ] tion. [ ] [ ] hopes that this feeling [ ] Cooper's favour, [ ] have [ ] the theatre to be filled nightly, during [ ] engagement; but, although aided by Mr. E. Forrest, [ ] a [ ] unprofitable one to the treasury; yet [ ] of Cooper [ ] Forrest, in the [ ] plays, should [ ] [ ] powerful enough, in the [ ] of times, to insure success to any manager bold enough to present it to the public, at [ ] [ ] himself of fifty per cent on the amount which he received for admission. Ruinous terms—as [ ] managers have [ ] learnt, [ ] their sorrow, but which [ ] [ ] demand, and what is more extraordinary, receive.

Planton, [ ] dentist, attempted Richard the Third, on [ ] 6th of May, to the amusement of those only who [ ] derive gratification from very [ ] acting, and who discovered that, Oh, go a head, [ ] not Shakspeare, a discovery Mr. [ ] made before them, as he searched the book diligently to [ ] [ ] the prompter had given him the wrong word, [ ] sluding with, "I see him—he is not there—go a head—your Shakspeare is [ ] hard for me," and the curtain [ ] amid roars of laughter, groans and [ ] Nor would the audience suffer [ ] farce of "Where Shall I Dine," [ ] proceed, until I made an apology for what they deemed a piece of impertinence, in permitting Mr. Planton to perform. [ ] pity they do [ ] retain the [ ] notions of propriety now,—the [ ] would [ ] better worth attending.

Mr. and [ ] Blomen appeared for my benefit, [ ] [ ] house; [ ] more gratifying to my feelings, from [ ] mortifications I had experienced during [ ] season in the discharge of my [ ] stage [ ] man and his [ ] in the fable, I found that [ ] endeavour [ ] please every body, [ ] the sure method to please nobody.

Notwithstanding [ ] extraordinary exertions made by [ ] management, [ ] continued novelty presented [ ] audience, much dissatisfaction was expressed, that [ ] opera, [ ] [ ] been produced at the Park Theatre, New York, with Messrs. Pearman and Hara, and Miss Austin, supporting the principal characters, had not been tried at the Chestnut Street, where they were convinced it would be [ ] ported. Mr. Warren, anxious to please all parties, entered into an engagement with the lady and the gentlemen, agreeing to provide and pay for a suitable chorus, such additional instrumental music in the Orchestra as they might require; indeed, the arrangements called forth the praise of Mr. Berkeley, whom the details were intrusted. All parties sanguine in their expectations; but by this engagement Mr. Warren upwards of a thousand dollars, (only two nights producing the expenses, and one of these a benefit,) and I lost—my reputation, Iago. During these unfortunate operas, the sons of harmony were out of tune. Mr. H. brought accusations against the integrity of the theatre, which brought blows in return for impertinence. During the males, he received a black eye, and I had the mortification of being paraded before the Mayor of the city, on a charge of assault and battery, with threats of violence, and bound over to keep the peace under a penalty of one thousand dollars. This did not add to the attraction of the opera theatre; but things will happen occasionally in regulated families, and such occasions with our old proverb "least said, soonest mended."

On the 1st of May, Mr. Rowbotham, one of the most successful attached to the theatre, made his debut in "Jane Shore." He will be scarcely by afterwards were his warm admirers, that was difficulty I could prevail on the newspaper to give him a fair chance. There was but one feeling among the corps editorial toward him, and that one of the most ungenerous. He afterwards became a great favourite, and Manager of Chesnut Street Theatre, universally regretted. Mrs. Rowbotham appeared as Lucretia of the "Rendezvous," on the 19th of May, rising by rapid degrees, in favour with her audience, until her loss was felt more severely by the play-goers, than any one of her predecessors. She was engaged by me in London, for a comparatively insignificant situation, but became one of the greatest favourites of the really talented company of the Chesnut Theatre. She made sad havoc of a few who crossed the Atlantic during that season. Mr. and Mrs. Rowbotham, Mr. Southwell, Mrs. S. Chapman, Mr. Kerr, Mr. Emery, and Mr. Willis, all paid the debt of within a few years after their arrival.

On the 3rd of June, Mr. Warren eloped with Mr. Willis, during the performance of "Clari," leaving the theatre in time being, minus a portion of the orchestra and a Leoda in the Episode. This foolish marriage broke the spirit of Mr. Warren, who never recovered from the shock his feelings sustained upon the occasion; although reconciled to his daughter.

ter, it preyed upon his mind and impaired his health; he was never the good-humoured John Fals.

Mrs. Sloman and Miss Clara Fisher, were the last of the season, their attraction completely gone, both engagements commenced and concluded to a beggarly account of empty boxes, with the exception of Mrs. Sloman's benefit—known to fail.

Cowell having returned from Baltimore, (where this season had been a great success) opened the Walnut Street Theatre, announcing that, with the aid of the brush of Mr. Walker, the talented painter of the Park Theatre, New York, he would produce a spectacle which should eclipse everything heretofore seen in Philadelphia, in beauty of scenery and machinery.

Possessing, as I did, the aid of Lewis in the mechanical department, and of Chapman in the arrangement of melo-drama, I determined that the well merited reputation acquired by the "Red Rover," should not be wrested from us without an effort. I accepted the challenge, and held a conference with S. Chapman, Lewis, H. Warren, and Griffith, the stage-carpenter, to find some piece which should enable us to retire from the contest of the longest season ever known in Philadelphia, not only with honour but with victory. The "Gnome King," presented itself, as furnishing the greatest scope for not only inventive faculty, but scenic effect. With Mr. Warren's approbation, I determined to prepare it for presentation, in the most perfect manner. It was produced in June, completely annihilating the "Sleeping Beauty," which was well got up at the Walnut Street Theatre, thus closing the first season of my management, on the 21st of June, with flying colours. The "Gnome King" was acted eleven nights, and when the theatre closed, I entertained sanguine hopes it would be a card to open with for the following season.

The theatre was open two hundred acting nights, during which not one week had elapsed without the appearance of a "star." Considering the rapid succession with which the talent that could be obtained was placed before the public, I produced the dramatic spectacle of "Peter Wilkins," "The Red Rover," "Thirty years of the Life of a Gambler," and the "Gnome King," four heavy scenery pieces in the despatch hitherto unknown in an American theatre; four new tragedies; two full operas of three acts each, and one entirely original, of one act; eighteen new farces; one musical comedy; one play, (the "Usurper") in five acts; and three domestic melo-dramas; in all thirty-four new pieces, eleven revivals of pieces previously acted in Philadelphia, but almost forgotten. The receipts were great, beyond previous seasons; averaging very nearly five hundred [redacted] night. [redacted] amount paid to "stars," the expenditure necessary to [redacted] the wardrobe, which was almost entirely new, and [redacted] expenditure incurred in England and the Continent, left only a small balance in the treasury, (but a good stock of reputation,) to commence the following season.

The stars of the season recorded, many of whom played two and three engagements, were Mr. Horn, Mrs. Knight, Mrs. Sloman, Mrs. Austin, Mr. Sloman, Mr. Hackett, Mr. E. Forrest, Miss George, Miss Kelly, Mr. Burroughs, Miss Clara Fisher, Miss Rock, Mr. Cooper, Mademoiselle Celeste, and Mr. Pearman—an array of talent not often offered in the same period, and rarely, if ever, supported by a stock company of excellent actors.

At the conclusion of this season, Mr. R. Peters, jun., expressed to [redacted] Mr. Warren's unqualified approbation of the manner in which I had conducted the business of the theatre; and, [redacted] proof of his sincerity, proposed, if agreeable [redacted] me, as [redacted] was getting too old for [redacted] business, [redacted] [redacted] take [redacted] into partnership. This was the first idea I had of becoming manager, on my own account. Flattering as [redacted] proposal was, with the prospect of two [redacted] theatres in the [redacted] for [redacted] following season, I decided to reject it; but circumstances occurred in rapid succession, which induced me to alter that resolution.

During the visit paid annually in the summer to Washington city, by the [redacted] of [redacted] Philadelphia Theatre, [redacted] [redacted] only [redacted] proceeding with the alterations commenced [redacted] W [redacted] Theatre. Here I taken [redacted] rejected, [redacted] [redacted] have been the result, both to [redacted] [redacted] and myself; by acting in concert and not [redacted] opposition, we should [redacted] secured [redacted] [redacted] One expression of [redacted] [redacted] my intentions; he said, "Wemyss, don't leave me." "Warren, I will not: we sink or swim together." I wrote to Mr. Peters on the subject of his proposition, at Mr. Warren's desire; and from that letter may be dated the unfortunate partnership of Pratt and Wemyss, attended with [redacted] [redacted] gleam of sunshine—the sequel, desolation and ruin.

VII.

Battle! Theatre, was deemed client. A Firmament of Stars. "Lay on, Macduff," Blow for Blow. Madame Fearon's First Appearance in Philadelphia. E. Forrest. Dramas and German Preparations Close the "He that Fights and Runs Away," &c., Hardly Used, but not Boston.

At the close of the Washington season, Mr. S. Chapman left to join Mr. Wood, whose new theatre, in Arch Street, was to open on the 1st of October, 1828; the only actor, and I record it with pride, whose sense of honour was not strong enough to resist the offer of increased emolument for decreased reputation, in violation of contract, to establish, built with the avowed purpose of ruining (if possible) Mr. Warren, from whose enterprise they were at present in the United States.

That Mr. Chapman had no cause of complaint, following letter from him, after Mr. Wood relinquished the management of the new theatre, and he wished to return to the service he had deserted, will prove:

(COPY.)

"Philadelphia, December 12, 1828.

"Sir—I write by the desire, and at the suggestion of Mr. It is his wish that I should again enlist under your banners; and from the gentlemanly treatment I met with from yourself and Mr. Wemyss, I must acknowledge that nothing would give me greater pleasure, provided I received a fair remuneration for my services. I understand you are about to take a part of your company to Baltimore; should that be the case, I should like much to become a member of it; and should any hostility exist between Mr. Wemyss, or yourself, and me, most happy to consider (as I always have) a matter of course; and forget it. You know, I believe, my willingness to serve, and my ability, and how anxious I am to forward the interest of that leader, whose officer I consider myself. Mr. Jefferson has kindly offered to deliver you this, who will perhaps state more fully my wishes on the occasion.

"I am, sir,

"Yours, truly,

(Signed) "SAMUEL CHAPMAN.

"To WILLIAM WARREN, Esq.,

Chapman was of much importance to the theatre. To him I had confided the arrangement of melo-dramatic spectacle, which he executed with credit to himself and the theatre. He had, since his arrival in the United States exhibited much discontent at what he was pleased to term his paltry salary, (one of his own proposing in London, and higher than he ever before received.) So well satisfied with his exertions was I, that I recommended Mr. Warren, before we had the slightest idea of his intended treason, to place his salary on the list for the following year at twenty-eight dollars per week, instead of twenty-two, the terms of his unexpired contract. This intention was communicated to him, and met by the information that he did intend to remain in the theatre. His salary advanced to the amount offered him by Mr. Wood.

It is not, therefore, to be wondered at, that even the respect of Mr. Warren for Mr. Jefferson, whose daughter Elizabeth, Chapman had married, could not prevail upon him to accede to my proposition for one who had so unceremoniously violated existing contracts. Chapman possessed literary acquirements of no mean order. The cessation of friendly intercourse between us was matter of regret, but being in some measure bondsman for his fidelity, it was the only course could pursue; and from the hour of his desertion until his death, we never exchanged a passing salutation, although I do not think any ill-feeling existed on either side. My position at Chesnut Theatre rendered it impossible his visits, without apparently abandoning dereliction from the strict path of rectitude, which should have guided his business transactions; while, as I looked upon it as a matter of business and laughed at it.

We commenced the campaign of 1828, in Baltimore, early in the month of September; and notwithstanding the attraction of a new and also a good stock company, the aid of Mr. Mrs. Sloman, Miss Rock, Mr. Cooper, Celeste, and the successful male-dramas of the "Rover," "Gambler's Fate," and the "Gnome King," the season was a failure. Indeed, experience proves Holliday Street Theatre commences its season with bad houses, which gradually grow worse, until it closes, leaving the actors unpaid, and the manager always in difficulty. The one hundred and twenty-six free admissions, in each season, explain the sooner is an attractive bill laid them, for a theatrical campaign, with the price of admission fixed at one dollar to the boxes, than the newspapers with advertisements offering stockholders' tickets at 25 cents per night, the season. The only great benefit, which, as usual, was filled to overflowing.

Battle—battle—battle.—We now approach the seasons 1828 and 1829, in Philadelphia, where we shall find three theatres and a circus struggling for existence, where, heretofore, one was deemed sufficient. Mr. Wood opened Arch on the 1st of October, 1828, with the comedy of the "Honey Moon," and the afterpiece of "Three and the Deuce." The French Opera was placed in the Chestnut Street Theatre ■■■ check this move, until Mr. Warren ■■■ ready to commence his season, which we did on Thursday, the 18th of November; opening with the play of the "Gambler," in which Mr. Cooper and Mrs. Sloman appeared, and "Fish Out of Water," for Mr. Sloman, as the farce. Three stars to commence with!!!

The stars announced by Mr. Wood as engaged to appear, were Celeste, and her sister Constance, Mr. Holland, Miss Kelly, Mr. Horn, Mrs. Austin, Miss Rock, and James Wallack.

From the last-named gentleman much was expected. His popularity was great, and he might be considered as the only antagonist we had to fear. He had previously written to Mr. Warren, offering his services ■■■ ■■■■ nights for five hundred pounds sterling, which terms were not accepted. Mr. Wood agreed to give him two hundred dollars per night, which ■■■ would have been foolish to reject. I now turned ■■■ ■■■■ ■■■ Mr. E. Forrest, as the only star most likely to occupy the nights of Wallack's engagement in Philadelphia, with profit to the Chestnut Street Theatre. To my surprise I received a proposition asking two hundred dollars per night. I laughed at this proposal, and in reply stated he must be either mad, or think me so, to make such a proposition; which, to have yielded an equal sum to the management, must have averaged nightly seven hundred dollars!! He succeeded in obtaining these terms from the manager of the Walnut Street Theatre. All these engagements will account for the speedy bankruptcy of the managers throughout the United States, and the fortunes acquired by "stars" through their downfall.

On the 6th of November, Maywood appeared at the Arch Street Theatre, as "King Lear!" and from that time became identified with the Philadelphia stage, but not as a tragedian. No—to New York we resign all the laurels he boasts in that way. As the representative of Scotchmen, he is a valuable actor; but it is as a manager and an active business man, that his reputation is based in this city: for the opportunity he is indebted to me, as I appointed him acting manager of the Washington and Baltimore theatres, in 1829.

On the 17th of November, Mrs. Knight opened in Adels, in the "Haunted Tower." It will scarcely be credited, that the second night of her engagement yielded only eighty dollars; while Cooper and Mrs. Sloman were not doing much better. On the 2nd of November, a novelty was presented in the person of Herr Oline, whose graceful movements on ■■■ elastic cord, (what a fashionable title for the tight rope!) astonished the good people of Philadelphia.

The commencement of our season was a bad one. Notwithstanding Mr. Warren paid Cooper fifty dollars per night, Mrs. Knight fifty dollars per night, and Mr. and Mrs. Bloman one hundred and twenty dollars per week, in addition to the current expenses of the theatre, the receipts did not average more than one hundred and fifty dollars per night, to meet an expenditure of 350 dollars. The only consolation was to be found in the fact, that the Arch Street Theatre was not doing better, although Mr. Wood had the advantage of a prosperous opening.

My whole energy was directed to divide the town, if possible, during the engagement of Mr. Wallack, whose first appearance was announced for the 26th of November, as Hamlet. I was certain if this engagement could be broken down, the fortunes of the Arch Street Theatre would be broken with it; I therefore announced Herr Oline's benefit, with a grand ascension from the back of the stage to the gallery, surrounded by fireworks, on the 27th of November. Aided by Mrs. Knight, in the new farce of "The Invincibles," which made so decided a hit, the admirable manner in which the ladies went through the manual exercise, being marked by the long-continued applause of the audience, the whole was a most successful talent of the theatre being brought to bear, had the desired effect: we triumphed, and it was a triumph well worth the sacrifice made to obtain it.

But as one good turn deserves another, Mr. Wood prepared a similar reception for Clara Fisher, from whom we anticipated a few nights of good business. On the 3rd of December, the night announced for her first appearance, Mr. Wood announced his own name for a benefit, with the powerful aid of Mr. Wallack, as a volunteer; but neglected to act on the occasion himself, an omission so singular, as at once to open our eyes to the real intention. I therefore, after much persuasion, induced Warren to announce his benefit on the same night, with Clara Fisher as a volunteer.

The gauntlet of opposition was thus bravely thrown; although many were foolish enough to blame Mr. Warren for allowing his name to appear in opposition to his late partner, but his rival. The only business answer is, Mr. Wood announced his name to strengthen Wallack's engagement, which began to be known as a failure; and Mr. Warren met this de guerre by a similar announcement, to strengthen the engagement of Miss Clara Fisher. In the whole course of my management, I never exercised a better piece of generalship, as the event proved.

The contest was so close, that the houses were as near à ti as possible; but it was a death blow to the Arch Street Theatre, under Mr. Wood's management. After trying the reduction the price of admission, (of which Mr. Wood says, "it belongs") in the hands of Mr. Wallack's engagement, the theatre closed, never to be opened again under Mr. Wood's management, whose reign, in his new theatre, had been a short and not very merry one.

Wallack made an application to me, to play at the Chestnut Street Theatre, in consequence of Mr Wood's failure to comply with the terms of his contract,—he could not pay him;—and on the 20th of December, 1828, he appeared in Brutus, in Howard Payne's play, at the Chestnut Theatre; and on the following night, as "Cassius" Surface, and Michael, in the "Adopted Child." Thus terminated his visit to Philadelphia, most unprofitably to him.

MADAME

made her first appearance in Philadelphia, at the Arch Street Theatre, on the 8th of December, as Fioretta, in "The Cabinet." This lady was decidedly the best English singer who ever visited the United States; although one who never played a successful engagement. Her appearance was not in her favour; her figure was too much enbaspoint for an American eye; she was really fat, fair, and past forty; but in the science of music, I doubt whether Malibran herself excelled her. The young ladies, who are taught to beat a tune upon the piano for the amusement of papa and mamma, could not appreciate the difficulty of her "cadenza," or the study required to form a perfect singer: nay, they had the bad taste to laugh at some of the most beautiful and difficult passages, which she executed with such precision and brilliancy.

The taste for opera (and even now, it is more a fashion than a taste,) had no existence then; La Sonnambula and Norma had not become familiar to the ear; Mrs. Wood, Miss Sheriff, and Mrs. Seguin had not charmed all our fashionable ladies into ecstasies. The prima donna of the Neapolitan theatre was deemed to return home, mortified with her reception, with no very exalted opinion of the American taste for music.

She declared this to be the country where mediocrity of talent was paid beyond its worth, but where excellence in music, painting, or poetry, would pine and decay for want of patronage; and there is too much truth in the assertion. The fact is,—neither the English or the Americans can boast, phrenologically, of the bump of music; the sound of pounds, shillings and pence, with the one, and dollars with the other, is the sweetest music their ears can listen to.

The last night of the present season at the Arch Street Theatre, was announced for Roberts' benefit, on the 22nd of December. On the 25th it closed; re-opened, with Roberts announced as manager, and finally closed on the 20th of December, for Mrs. Blake's benefit, with "Alexander the Great," and the "Turnpike Gate."

So far, so good. Mr. Warren had made great exertions, and those exertions had succeeded. He now engaged Mr. Hunt, Miss Philips, and Miss Clara Fisher, to produce the opera of "Native Land," which had failed at the Arch Street. When produced for Mrs. Austin's benefit, it made a decided hit; and the prospects of "Old Drury," as the Chestnut Street was now termed, began to assume a profitable aspect. Blake was unremitting in his exertions to procure a good company for the opening of the Walnut Street Theatre, on the first of January, which the closing of the Arch Street, rendered an easier task than he had any right to expect.

Warren became frightened at the prospect of further opposition; the price demanded and obtained by the stars, he refused to comply with; this threw Monsieur and Madame Charles Boust Vestris, and the corps de ballet, from the [redacted] yette into the arms of Blake, who eagerly secured their services [redacted] any price. With the failure of Wood before his eyes, Warren wished to [redacted] from the contest; [redacted] said, "You are young and enterprising; fight the battle, and leave me as an older general, to give you advice: two thousand dollars will relieve me from all present difficulty; now if you can advance that sum, I will let the whole concern upon reasonable terms."

In an evil hour for all parties, I induced Mr. Lewis T. Pratt to join [redacted] in the offered speculation; and on the [redacted] of December, 1828, [redacted] leave of the Chestnut Street Theatre [redacted] by [redacted] of [redacted] stockholders, assigned to Pratt and Wemyss; we paid two [redacted] dollars, [redacted] down, [redacted] agreed [redacted] pay the rent [redacted] Chestnut Street Theatre, and [redacted] Mr. [redacted] [redacted] thousand a year for [redacted] use of his [redacted] property, including the rent of Baltimore and Washington theatres; in [redacted] [redacted] which, he was to receive forty dollars a week, as [redacted] actor, during [redacted] continuation of the lease; possession of [redacted] property to be given [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] 1829.

[redacted] [redacted] farewell benefit, as [redacted] [redacted] 30th, [redacted]; [redacted] play of "Merry Wives of Windsor," [redacted] [redacted] spectacle [redacted] "Illusion," most beautifully got up, and [redacted] [redacted] New Year's pageant, [redacted] no alteration in the [redacted] [redacted] ment, [redacted] place. The last night of Mr. Warren's management, was [redacted] play of "Adelgitha," [redacted] "Illusion."

[redacted] the first of January, 1829, Pratt and Wemyss [redacted] menced their career, with an address, written by James S. Barker, the grand spectacle of "Illusion," and a new pantomime, entitled "Philip Quirin." The Walnut Street Theatre opened for the first time, since its alteration from a circus to a theatre, under the management of James Blake, "Honeymoon," and "Lottery Ticket;" but houses were to overflowing, and our yield only four hundred

In commencement of our undertaking, difficulty surrounded us at every step—Mr. Warren having declined our aid at the exorbitant prices demanded. Had we even been willing to comply, the most attractive were engaged to the managers of the Walnut Street Theatre. We were therefore compelled to find the attraction in male-drama spectacles. Mr. Warren had despatched Mr. Wepfer to Germany, at the close of last season, for the purpose of bringing over a full and efficient corps de ballet, for whom we had kept the season open from any entangling engagements, and who were hourly expected.

He arrived without a single dancer, and an addition of five musicians to our already excellent orchestra, who were only wanted in the event of his success with the dancers. However, I shall here record the names of this orchestra, because I do not believe such an efficient one was ever assembled, before or since, within the walls of an American theatre. Leader, Mr. Braun; Mr. Willie, Mr. Wepfer, Mr. Diezman, Mr. Meigner, Mr. Skenlocker.

We were compelled to keep the Baltimore and Washington Theatres open during a winter season. At Baltimore, the management was entrusted to Mr. John Sloman, who resigned it into the hands of Mr. Maywood. In Washington, as members of this company, were Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Flynn, Mr. Stone, (author of "Metamora,") and his wife, Mrs. McClean, and many other actors of talent. Our hopes of success, in Washington, were built upon the crowds which would assemble at the metropolis to witness the inauguration of General Jackson, on the 4th of March, 1829, as President of the United States. Unfortunately for our hopes, Mrs. Jackson died, and mourning, not festivity, was the order of the day.

On the 6th of January, Madame Vestris and her husband made their first appearance at the Walnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia, attracting within those walls the fashionable society, on which the Chestnut Street Theatre alone can depend for success. The Rubicon once passed, the difficulty vanished; attraction alone was required to induce them to repeat their visit—and yet the leaders of fashion, through Mr. Walsh, at that time their organ, cautioned the managers of the Chestnut Street Theatre against engaging French dancers, as no ladies could visit the theatre to witness such an honour of General Jackson, was produced to a house of one thousand dollars, the first and [redacted] of the same race. On the 12th, the "Battle of Waterloo," with the [redacted] of seven volunteer companies, was brought out with great success, and on [redacted] same night Mr. E. Forrest made his appearance [redacted] Walnut Street Theatre, as Damon, for which he received two hundred dollars!!! The town, for a time, was Forrest mad, and the managers reaped a rich harvest from their mad speculation. Without wishing to detract from Mr. Forrest's merit, it was a lucky circumstance that Madam Vestris preceded him. He deserves his good fortune, and long may he live to enjoy it; I know no one who has encountered more difficulty from managers, to establish his position; and that knowledge makes me acknowledge he is right, now the tables are turned, to squeeze as much out of them as possible, although I have suffered in the process. The idea that Mr. Forrest could be worth 200 dollars per night, while Mr. Cooper, in his brightest day, never asked more than 50, is a riddle, for those only who paid [redacted] money, [redacted] solve.

On the 8th of January, Richard Penn Smith's drama, in

Our piece of the "Battle of Waterloo," was [redacted] as we could wish, and [redacted] have continued [redacted] theatre, [redacted] a melancholy accident. On [redacted] January, [redacted] Tryal Deves, a [redacted] of one of [redacted] companies, was shot upon the stage, during the performance; [redacted] lingered until [redacted] 16th, at 2 o'clock, but never spoke [redacted] the fatal accident. Such an occurrence within the walls of a theatre, [redacted] well calculated to [redacted] [redacted] may. They retired immediately, [redacted] horror of the scene [redacted] increased by the fact that the unhappy [redacted] had thus met his death in the performance of an [redacted] kindness to the managers, had left a wife and nine children, (the youngest not six [redacted] the old,) who were entirely dependant on [redacted] their daily bread.

[redacted] only reparation in my power [redacted] to the widow—a benefit, [redacted] of any expense whatever; and wishing [redacted] the house crowded, I addressed a note to the managers of [redacted] Walnut Street Theatre, requesting, if compatible with their arrangements, they would close their Theatre, and add to the attractions of the evening, by allowing the members of their [redacted] company to unite with ours. Mr. Blake declined closing [redacted] doors, but kindly offered to appropriate a night at the Walnut [redacted] Theatre, at no distant period, for the same benevolent purpose, for which Mr. E. Forrest volunteered his gratuitous aid.

The benefit took place at the Chestnut Street Theatre when Mrs. Sandford, the daughter of Mr. Holman, volunteered her services. The play was "Every One has his Fault," and the afterpiece the "Adopted Child." Each actor resigned his night's salary; the carpenters and doorkeepers also tendered their mite, which I added to the gross receipts.

The Washington Circus also gave a benefit for the same purpose, from which Mrs. Deves realized about one hundred dollars, thus proving that actors, with all their faults, are not devoid of charity to their fellow men in distress.

I now approach a blot upon this subject I would willingly obliterate. Messrs. Inslee and Blake announced their benefit; I permitted Mr. E. Forrest to return one night earlier from his engagement at Washington, for the purpose of lending his aid to the ~~benefit~~ purpose, when, to the astonishment of the whole city, the boxes being taken for the aid of the widow and orphans, and an overflowing house expected, the managers, (stems upon them!) not content with deducting their nightly expenses, announced in the bills of the day that one-half only of the gross proceeds would be given to Mrs. Deves and her children, thus turning the misfortunes of ~~the~~ widow and orphans into a vile source of profit ~~to~~ themselves. No one was more indignant than Mr. E. Forrest at such conduct, and it is only to be regretted he did not demand from Inslee and ~~Blake~~ 200 dollars for his performance, and have given it as a donation from himself to those he intended to serve.

Whether Mr. Inslee or Mr. Blake have the credit of this arrangement, as Rob Roy says, "is between their conscience and the long day," but money so obtained could not prosper.

I am perfectly aware a justification of this measure has been attempted, on the miserable plea that the widow had no claim upon them, her husband was not shot in ~~their~~ theatre. All this is true: but the benefit advertised ~~at~~ the Chesnut ~~theatre~~ rendered less productive by their ~~that~~ ~~theatre~~ would also ~~be~~ given for the ~~same~~ object ~~at~~ ~~the~~ Theatre—thus preventing those who would only have ~~their~~ theatre on such an occasion from ~~going~~ Chesnut Street Theatre ~~at~~ all. Certain it is ~~their~~ house was crowded, and ~~they~~ pocketed ~~three~~ three and four hundred dollars designed for the children of Deves.

Mr. E. Forrest ~~did~~ not ~~meet~~ ~~the~~ idea ~~of~~ was pre-g his services ~~at~~ ~~the~~ and Blake, ~~at~~ wards of ~~one~~ hundred miles, in a severe winter, with ~~the~~ purpose ~~of~~ aiding those unhappy children who ~~had~~ suddenly deprived of their natural protectors in ~~the~~ ~~theatre~~ unexpected ~~the~~ expressed his indignation loudly ~~to~~ his friends upon the subject.

From this truly lamentable occurrence may be dated the long train of misfortune which assailed the management of Pratt and Wemyss. By no exertion could we possibly raise a house sufficient to pay the expenses; our capital was dwindling away, while the play of the "Rivals," cast thus: Sir, Anthony Absolute, Warren: Captain Absolute, Wemyss: Fag, Hathwell: Faulkland, Southwell: Lusus O'Trigger, Mercer: Acres, Jefferson: David, J. Jefferson: Malaprop, Mrs. Francis: Lydia Languish, Mrs. Norrbotham: Julia, Mrs. Darley: Luoy, Miss Hathwell: for the benefit of a star, (Madame Heloise,) produced only twenty-two dollars and fifty cents!! Alas! for the legitimate drama. One of the comedies in the British language, acted as well as it could be at any theatre in the United States of America, to such a sum!

Misfortunes never come single. Mr. E. Forrest who at [redacted] admiring crowds in Philadelphia, could not play to an average of one hundred and thirty dollars a night in Washington city! during the session of Congress. Mr. Wallack played to still less, and on one occasion not a single individual presented himself to inquire whether the theatre was open, when [redacted] graced the head of [redacted]. The inauguration week was supported by the aid of Herr Gline, [redacted] Washington did, certainly, with the aid of [redacted] and [redacted] Steman, [redacted] Clara Fisher, Ronzi Vestris, Mr. [redacted] Forrest, and [redacted] Wallack, yield a profit [redacted] five hundred dollars in a [redacted] of three months. Well done! Washington. It is more than either Philadelphia [redacted] to—Pratt and Wemyss.

On the 18th of January, 1829, the Chesnut [redacted] closed for the season, for my benefit, with [redacted] comedy of "Wild Oats," and the drama of [redacted] "Bottle Imp." All bills paid, [redacted] no outstanding [redacted] against the treasury.

CHAPTER XVIII

Full Cry for Baltimore. More difficulties. Waggoners fast [redacted] a Snow- [redacted] Theatre Opened. Magnificent Plan for re-decorating [redacted] Drury. Return to Philadelphia. In at the Death. Walnut Street Theatre closed for ever, under the Management of Blake and Inslee. Fresh Start in a very Rainy Night. Play of the "Poor Gentleman," and Farce of the "Invincibles." The First full Opera ever acted in Philadelphia in the Italian Language. The two Theatres springing up in existence again, under fresh Management. The Beginning of the [redacted] Close of the Management of Pratt and Wemyss.

With an unwilling heart, but yielding to necessity, we resolved to leave a clear field to our successful rivals, and try what Baltimore would accomplish for a winter season [redacted] by Wallack. [redacted] Gline, Vestris, Monsieur and [redacted]

Achille, Mr. and Mrs. Pearman, and Mrs. Hamblin, as stars. We therefore closed "Old Drury."

In Baltimore, a new difficulty met us; the stockholders of the theatre contended that although Mr. Warren had a right to occupy it free of rent, excepting only the season tickets, he had no right to transfer that privilege to a third party, that we could not open unless we agreed to pay fifteen dollars per night, which, added to a license demanded by the corporation of the city of Baltimore, amounting to ten more, made twenty-five dollars per night for the privilege of opening a theatre in the worst theatrical town in America.

Our engagements being made, we could not stop to argue points of right, but agreed to the demand as a matter of expedience, and on the 30th of January, 1829, I started for Baltimore on as fine a winter morning as ever dawned. At Lancaster I met Mr. and Mrs. Rowbotham; we slept at York, and when we arose in the morning the ground was covered with snow, which continued to fall during the day—a fair specimen of the weather we were doomed to encounter during the winter.

The first news I heard on my arrival at Baltimore was, that the trustees refused to give possession of the theatre, under Warren's lease, and a report prevailing that we should not be allowed to open on Monday night. With Mr. Wallack engaged at a nightly salary of one hundred dollars, and the company assembling, it may be imagined I was in no very enviable situation. I waited upon Mr. Lucas, jun., and Mr. Cohen, called a meeting of the trustees, and all difficulty was satisfactorily arranged.

I commenced the season on Monday, the 2nd February, under every disadvantage. The snow-storm had so retarded the waggons that they did not reach Baltimore until four o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Mercer had not arrived, and we were compelled to hustle through the play of "Pizarro" in the best manner we could, I playing at least four parts. An apology was due to the audience, which they received with much good nature, knowing how we had contended to open at all. It was an awful night, the snow drifting in every direction, yet the receipts amounted to 208 dollars, which, for Baltimore, augured well. Herr Cline played the following night to 65 dollars—his second night only yielded 48 dollars; while Wallack only played to 165 dollars. An effort was necessary to rouse the Baltimoreans; therefore I tried Wallack, Mrs. Hamblin, and Herr Cline, on the same night, to which I added Monsieur and Madame Achille—the receipts, 336 dollars. This was ruinous—Wallack 100 dollars, Herr Cline 50 dollars, Achille 20 dollars, Mrs. Hamblin 20 dollars, two hundred dollars for extra aid. Vestris and Rosalie, still worse—and now hold up your hands in wonder, and then blush for the spirit of your monumental city: Monsieur Vestria, Madame Vestria, Mademoiselle Rosalie, Mr. and Mrs. Pogerman, all in one night—gross receipts, 84 dollars!!!

"It is impossible!" And so would I have said, had I not seen it. Here, then, we were on the high road to ruin; but let me do the trustees of the Holiday Street Theatre justice. Seeing and approving the efforts made, they desired the weekly rent to remain until we heard from them on the subject. This was a seasonable relief, although a small one; but heretofore we had met all payments.

Misery loves company; and it was with a feeling of satisfaction, on the verge of ruin ourselves, we heard that Inlee and Blake, whom we had left in Philadelphia in the full tide of success, were unable to pay their actors; and, to add to their pecuniary difficulties, were at personal enmity with each other.

We resolved to be in at the death, and came to the bold resolution of re-decorating the Chestnut Street Theatre, and making one desperate effort for masterdom.

Mr. Pratt hinted to me, that a new name might possibly be serviceable as stage manager, and proposed Mr. John Jefferson; the popularity of his father's name pointing out the propriety of the choice. I named Rowbotham, as having more experience in the direction of the stage; and he was accordingly announced as stage manager, on the 9th of April, 1829. How he treated me for my kindness on every occasion to him, will appear hereafter;—"Seek fire in ice; but seek not gratitude in a white man's bosom." So says Lewis, in the "Castle Spectre;" and he had a tolerably fair estimate of mankind.

The plan furnished by Lewis, our machinist, for the decoration of the Chestnut Street Theatre, was magnificent. Had the agents not interfered and prevented the removal of the canopy over the dress boxes, it would have been the most beautiful theatre in the United States. We were compelled to alter our plans, and neatness was substituted for display; the dome alone retaining its originality of the burnished rays of a golden sun. It cost us two thousand dollars, and we had the use of it exactly ten weeks.

But leaving Mr. Pratt to superintend his carpenters at the Chestnut Street Theatre, in Philadelphia, let us return to Baltimore, where the season continued as disastrous as ever: but to the citizens of Baltimore, for their kindness to me as an individual, I must ever be grateful. The directors of the Fanny Bag Hall, requested me to announce my benefit, and they would visit the theatre in character, filling the pit at box prices. This plan was afterwards abandoned, each member being at liberty to visit any part of the house. The receipts were five hundred and fifty dollars; the pieces were,

"He lies Like Truth," and "The Bottle Imp." To my friend Boole, the auctioneer, I was indebted for this house; not the only favour I have received at his hands, for which I have nothing but the assurance his name bears.

Penn's play of "the Prodigals," was by me "Disowned," to avail myself of the popularity Bulwer's novel of that name produced it the time, at the Holiday Theatre in Baltimore. The exertions of Mr. Southwell and Mr. Jefferson's piece, before the acting of Mr. Rowbotham had an opportunity of rendering it triumphantly successful. It was afterwards performed in London.

During this whole season, the weather was our greatest enemy. A good box book was the sure forerunner of a snow-storm, or a deluge of rain, which continued during the evening.

Now for a marvellous story, but a true one. Mr. and Mrs. Pearman having been engaged to perform the opera of "Der Freyschutz," difficulty occurred with Mr. Braun the leader of the orchestra and Mr. Pearman, which ended with Mr. Braun leaving the orchestra and taking with him nearly all the German musicians. Mr. Dielman took the leader's chair, with five instruments, actually played the opera of "Der Freyschutz," in the city of Baltimore, successive nights, to houses averaging two hundred dollars—Mr. Maignen carrying us thus through a difficulty which appeared insurmountable.

The season was thus brought to a close. On the 9th of April we re-opened the Chestnut Street Theatre, with the "Poor Gentleman" and the "Invincibles;" the rain descending in torrents during the whole of the day. The Walnut Street Theatre closed on the 14th of April, with an announcement, that Mr. Blake's benefit would be postponed until the re-opening of the theatre; which never took place under the management of Ingle and Blake.

As our former failure had been attributed to want of attraction in the shape of stars, we resolved to make a vigorous attempt to reverse the fortunes of Old Drury. The season offered, even satisfied the stockholders, and their representative tickets, (the bane of all theatres;) but this time failing, the cry was, "Why did you not do this before you went to Baltimore?"

Wallack and Hamblin in the same plays; the French Corps de Ballet; Italian opera; and sang-dress Balls, were all offered in vain.

The theatre was re-decorated in handsome style; but another opposition awaited us, and like Bangs's issue, followed by a third. Mr. Aaron Phillips opened the Arch Street Theatre on the 15th, and closed it on the 25th. The Walnut Street Theatre opened immediately as a dramatic commonwealth, under B. Chapman, Green and Edmonds, on the 27th of May, the day we closed, to open no more.

On the 28th of April, we announced a Grand Fancy Ball, where everything was abundantly supplied but dancers. We could not muster two quadrilles upon the floor. This was repeated, by desire of those who witnessed the arrangements, on the 2nd of May; but here we had dancers enough, but so few spectators, that it proved a losing concern.

Mr. James Craig having received a letter from Mr. Horn, touching the performance of an Italian opera at the Chestnut Street Theatre, an arrangement was entered into for the services of himself, Madame Fearon, Madame Brichts, Signor Rosich, Signor Augrisani, and "La Triumphe del Musica" was produced on the 5th of May, with the following cast:—Aristea, Madame Fearon; Celestina, Madame Brichts; Count, Caroline C. Horn; Don Febeo, Signor Rosich; Briscoma, Signor Augrisani.

As this was the first Italian opera acted in Philadelphia, it gave great satisfaction, and in this worse than wretched season, produced four hundred dollars nightly. Could the parties themselves have varied the piece, they would have attracted fashionable audiences to the end of the season, the receipts increasing each night. As it was, Mr. Horn received eight hundred dollars for four nights, while the management, in receiving an equal sum, did not receive sufficient to defray the expenses of extra music, and incidental charges. Thus it is, when stars appear, and draw crowded houses, they not only pocket profits, but leave the manager minus; as it seldom happens, nights on which they do play, yield money sufficient to meet the necessary expenditure; which deficiency must be supplied from the manager's share of his stars' houses.

Until this system be reformed, adieu to any well-conducted theatre. If the public will be content to see one part pre-eminently acted, in preference to the whole play supported by mediocre talent, they will continue to patronise the stars; but if they wish for the rational amusement of a well-acted play, they will desert the stars, no matter how brilliant, to support the manager, who will secure to them such a stock company, as used to grace the boards of the Chestnut Street Theatre, when Warren, Wood, Duff, H. Wallack, Wemyss, Jefferson, Bilwett, Burke, Francis, Mrs. Entwistle, Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Darley, and Mrs. Francis, with a host of minor names, equal in merit to many that figure as stars at the present day, all of whom appeared in one play, without exciting the least comment.

At that time, a play was cast properly in every department; at present, the minor parts are filled in such a manner, that all gratification derived from the [redacted] of a superior actor, is [redacted] by the miserable bungling, and worse grammar, of those who are deemed of too little importance, to attract the notice of even a paid critic.

The public [redacted] correct this evil for themselves. [redacted] managers can procure actors—(no, not actors—individuals;) for three or four dollars per week; and the public allow such gentlemen to strut their brief hour upon the stage, murdering English grammar at every sentence, there is no hope of amendment.

But, if those persons who [redacted] to [redacted] the drama would unveil this system, they would [redacted] more good in one month towards the cause they profess to support, [redacted] will be accomplished [redacted] year, by puffing a manager, or landing a "star," who needs not such praise, or dreads their [redacted].

On [redacted] of May, Pratt and Wemyss closed the Chestnut Street Theatre, and terminated their management with [redacted] "Rencontre," "Wandering Boys," and "Fortune's Frolia." From the 1st of October, 1828, [redacted] the 27th of May, 1829, the struggle for ascendancy had been [redacted] throughout a cross fire. Wood opened the new theatre, and was the first to retire from the contest; Warren followed; [redacted] Pratt and Wemyss succeeded him. In [redacted] Blake, Aaron Philips, and the Commonwealth, formed from the broken and [redacted] tated forces of all the theatres, alone remained—the [redacted] of their [redacted] season causing their dissolution.

The stockholders of the Chestnut Street Theatre, re entered, and took possession of the theatre. The terms of the original lease not having been complied with, the sub-lease, of necessity, became void. The only regret I experienced, was, Mr. Warren had not continued the management; old recollections might have operated in his favour, and prevented the sacrifice of his theatrical property.

He felt keenly the neglect of his rich, and apparently once kind friends—his misfortunes hastening his death.

During the summer, the Washington Circus was altered into a Theatre which, for a few weeks, was very successful; [redacted] by [redacted] talents of Isherwood, Weinstein, Mr. and [redacted] Wells; M<sup>rs</sup> Maywood, Mrs. Stickney, Somerville, and Heyl. I played Marplot there, on the 23rd of July, for the benefit of Mr. Huddy, the artist, who had been unfortunately burnt out of his home. [redacted] Heyl's benefit, Warren and myself, and Mr. Rowbotham, played in "The way to get Married." It was a very pretty little theatre, and well conducted. I shall have to say a few words about it, at the close of the next season.

XIX.

Mr. Pratt in the Sold Alone, Mr. Phillips at the Arch. Davis's French Opera Company at the Chestnut Street. The Walnut Street. Chapman, Green and Edmonds. A French Corps de Ballet at the Tivoli in Market Street. Thus began the flourishing Winter Seasons of 1829 and 1830. Metamora. Faust. Theatrical Fund. Apparent necessity for such an [redacted] Coldness and Apathy of Actors in its behalf.

MR. PRATT made an application for a [redacted] lease to the board of Agents, with the understanding, that if I made no application and he obtained the theatre, the outstanding [redacted] of the firm should be assumed by him. In making this arrangement and retiring from the management, I intended to leave the city of Philadelphia; but fate would not permit me. I applied to every manager in New York and Boston, without [redacted] Theatricals were in that state, that theatres were closing, and managers becoming bankrupts every day.

The winter season of 1829 and 1830, was commenced by Mr. A. J. Phillips, at the Arch Street Theatre, on the 31st of August, with the play of the "West Indian," and the melodrama of "Luke the Labourer." He introduced to the Philadelphia audience, Mr. Archer, Mr. Walton, Mr. Andrews, Mr. Charles Young, Mr. Hazard, Mr. John Fisher, Mr. Jervis; Mrs. Young, Miss Hamilton, Mrs. Vernon, Miss Coleman, and many other actors of merit. He really had an excellent company; and what appeared to promise success, many new faces.

The French opera company, so termed, under Mr. Davis, opened the Chestnut Theatre, on the 7th of September, and Mr. [redacted] commenced [redacted] season, on the [redacted] of October, with the "Honey Moon," and "A Roland for an Oliver."

The Walnut [redacted] Theatre also opened under the management of S. Chapman, Green and Edmonds, on the 7th of September, with the play of "She would and She would not;" and the farce of the "Turnpike Gate," Miss Clara Fisher being the star of the evening.

Messrs. Fogg and Stickney, opened an Amphitheatre; and a very inferior French corps de ballet, tried their fortune under Monsieur Babiere, at the old Tivoli, in Market street. It may be said, with truth, that Philadelphia was this season the emporium of all the regular dramatic talent of the United States; yet it was the most [redacted] one [redacted] known; the actors being literally in a state of desperation. For myself; for seven weeks I never received one cent from the treasury; and I have reason to know, others were not paid in better proportion.

English opera was the attempted attraction of the Chestnut Street Theatre, by Mr. and Mrs. Pearman. It was produced with every possible rehearsal; but met with little success.

This season was marked by the production of Stone's prize tragedy of "Metamora," by Mr. Philips, at the Arch Street Theatre, on the 1st of January, 1850. His anxiety to see Mr. E. Forrest in the original character thus prepared for him, crowded the theatre on each night of the performance, adding to his reputation as an actor, as well as to his private fortune. It is a very indifferent play, devoid of interest; but the character of Metamora is beautifully conceived, and will continue to attract, so long as Mr. E. Forrest is his representative; it was written for him, and will, in all probability, remain with him. Few actors would have the hardihood to assume their reputation in a character, so decidedly known as the best performance of the tragedy of the American stage, provoking comparison to their disadvantage.

"Faustus," too, formed quite a topic of conversation. Philips had spared no expense or exertion to produce this drama in a style worthy of a metropolitan theatre. Coyle's scenery was delightful; but the tact of Mr. S. Chapman, turned the puffing of his antagonist to his advantage. Possessing the aid of Lewis, he forestalled Philips' opinion, by producing this piece at the Walnut Street Theatre, on Saturday, December 12th, 1829, in such a manner as to satisfy the public, and ruin the prospects of the Arch Street Theatre, where every thing that scenery, music, costume, and machinery could do, was perfect. But it was not played until the 16th of December, when, for the cause here stated, it was a repayment to the manager for his labour. This was a fair business rivalry for which S. Chapman deserved great credit. He reaped by promptitude, the reward which belonged to Philips. While the two theatres were thus employed in the endeavour to neutralize their attraction, the Chestnut continued to drag on from week to week, without a chance of success.

Mr. James Murdock made his first appearance at the Arch Street Theatre on the 15th of Oct., 1829, as Frederick, in "Lover's Vows," a performance of much promise, and his judicious choice of De Camp for his first manager, enabled him to reach, in a few years, a respectable position in his profession. He is decidedly the best juvenile actor on the American stage.

Actors are proverbial for their improvidence in their arrangements: honest in principle, where they receive income, but living up to the full amount of it. In the season overtake them, when the manager is unable to pay their weekly salary, a few months will involve them in debt. They experience more than ordinary difficulty to extricate themselves; their vocation renders them also liable to accidents, and when ill health assails them, they are indeed helpless mortals. With the knowledge of these facts, it is not strange that every effort to establish a fund for the relief of the decayed actor in the United States, should prove abortive. It was attempted in Boston, where the proceeds of premium sales for tickets, on the nights of his performance, to be devoted to such an institution.

In New York, large sums have been contributed, of the disposal of which no person can or will give an account. In Philadelphia, we thought we had hit upon the right plan, by appointing a majority of the trustees from the walks of private life, but our funds were suffered to remain idle for seven years in the Philadelphia Bank, and when finally in 1829, on the loan of the Lehigh Coal Navigation Company, no interest was added to the principal, and the depreciation of the stock renders it doubtful whether the original investment will ever be paid.

The prospects of the fund, commenced in 1820, on the 1st of December, 1829, were most flattering. The depression of the interests of the drama made a collective effort of great importance; a committee of 12 met at each theatre for the purpose of forming a "General Fund." From the Chestnut Street: Jefferson, Wemyss, Kilner, Maywood, and Rowbotham. From Arch Street: Archer, Walton, Andrews, Roberts and Foot. From Market Street: S. Chapman, John Jefferson, Clarke, Green, W. Chapman. After preliminary arrangements, on the 20th of December, 1829, a set of rules and regulations for the government of the association, were formed, and signed by the following gentlemen:—W. B. Wood, E. Forrest, F. C. Wemyss, Joseph Jefferson, J. Green, S. Chapman, John Jefferson, Thomas Kilner, R. C. Maywood, G. Andrews, Archer, W. B. Chapman, J. H. Clarke, R. H. Rowbotham, J. F. Foot, T. J. Walton.

An election was held for officers, which resulted in the choice of James N. Barker, Edwin Forrest, Quintin Campbell, as Trustees; John Henry Clarke, as President; William B. Wood, as Secretary; R. C. Maywood, J. F. Foot, F. C. Wemyss, Thomas Archer, Samuel H. Chapman, Standing Committee.

The Fund association being thus organized, the following circular was addressed to every theatre in the United States, with a printed copy of the Rules and Regulations:

SIR, ON MADAM,

Your attention is earnestly requested to the enclosed BULK, and Regulations of the General Theatrical Fund.

The list of members will convince you of the readiness and sincerity with which its objects have been entered into; the expedience and necessity of such a society, I trust, will induce your hearty concurrence and co-operation; and I am authorized to add, that many liberal donations already have been bestowed.

By order,

(signed)

FOOT.

Secretary, T. F.

Mr. E. Forrest, with a promptitude which did honour both to his head and heart, tendered his gratuitous services for one night, at every city or town in which he might be engaged, in aid of the receipts, added to which, he gave a donation of fifty dollars; Miss Clara Fisher and Mrs. Sloman gave each a similar sum.

Messrs. E. L. Carey, Pierce Butler, W. E. Bridges, W. M. Israel, C. Alexander, J. Savage, F. A. Huber, P. Wetherall, C. Wetherall, G. D. Shaff, of the city of Philadelphia, each gave a donation, several of them expressing their intention to repeat the same annually, until the Fund should be firmly established. The first benefit took place on Tuesday, March 26th, at the Arch Street Theatre, on which occasion the Chestnut and Walnut were closed, and the actors of the three theatres employed in the performance. E. Forrest played Macbeth; the farce was the "Lancens;" and the first address on behalf of our infant association, was delivered by Mr. Archer, the stage manager of the Arch Street Theatre. The receipts were six hundred and five dollars; thus in less than three months, paying all expenses incurred, we had a balance in bank of seven hundred and sixty-five dollars, the most kindly feelings for our success in the community, during the worst theatrical season ever known in Philadelphia, when actors were suffering distress from the non-payment of salaries, and managers relieving themselves from the anticipated horrors of a prison, by the benefit of the insolvent laws.

All our labour was thrown away by the apathy of those most interested. The money obtained was permitted to remain idle in bank, the opportunity lost of receiving donations from the stars who visited us from Europe; the actors, one by one, declining to pay their dues, and the chance of realizing fifty thousand dollars, which would hourly have increased, forming a Fund to which every deserving actor could have looked with confidence for support in old age, placing him beyond the reach of misfortune, was lost!

Many years will elapse before so favourable an opportunity will again present itself: should it occur, I hope the actors will profit by experience, and establish a General Fund, which shall be as lasting as the profession, and to _____ point with pride and say, "This is my work."

CHAPTER XX.

No Song no Supper. Jefferson leaves the Theatre, and never afterwards Acts in Philadelphia. Plenty of Hard Work. _____ money. I give up at last in Despair, and come out with an Advertisement, "Starved Out." Man of Business behind a Counter. Calvin Mason, the Living Skeleton, _____ of _____ Philadelphia Actors during this Season.

Desolation and misery was now the order of the day. Lucky was the actor who could realize a few dollars from his benefit: _____ to salary, it was insanity to look for such a thing. To change your situation was by no means to better your position. But when it is known that the actors of the Chestnut Street Theatre, performed the opera of "No Song no Supper," without a note of instrumental music, the orchestra having struck, because they were not paid, some idea may be formed of _____ state of the theatres. The audience permitted the vocal music to proceed, and even honoured one or two pieces with an "encore."

Booth, who was engaged, was attacked with one of _____ fits of periodical insanity, to which he _____ subject, and was chained down to his bed, thus injuring instead of aiding our cause.

Jefferson, whose benefit was announced with the new play of "A School for Grown Children," could scarcely muster enough _____ pay the expenses, and resolved _____ leave the theatre. _____ manager having _____ the full _____ of his nightly charge on such occasions, offered him but half his income at the treasury, on Saturday. This was a blow the favourite comedian could not brook. The success of Bloman, an actor so greatly his inferior, had irritated him both with his manager and the audience; but what must have been the _____ of the public towards dramatic representation, when _____ a _____ whose reputation shed lustre on the theatre to which he was attached, _____ permitted to leave _____ city of Philadelphia with scarcely an inquiry as to _____ whereabouts, two-thirds of the audience ignorant of his departure. The last time he _____ in Philadelphia was for my benefit, kindly studying the part of Sir Beauful Constant, in "The Way to Keep Him," which _____ played admirably.

MR. JOSEPH

Was an actor formed in nature's merriest mood, a genuine son of Momus; there was a vein of rich humour running through-out all he did, which forced you to laugh despite yourself. He discarded grimace as unworthy of him, although no actor possessed a greater command over the muscles of his own face, or the of his audience, compelling you to laugh or cry at his pleasure. His excellent personation of old men acquired for him, before he had reached the meridian of life, the title of Old Jefferson.

The astonishment of strangers at seeing a good looking young pointed out in the street as Jefferson, whom they had seen the night previous, at the theatre, recently on the verge of existence, was the greatest which could paid the talent of the actor.

versatility astonishing; light comedy, pantomime, low comedy, occasionally juvenile tragedy. in very best school acquiring knowledge profession, father being an actor of repute Drury Lane Theatre, during the reign of Garrick, adept in all the "trickery" of the stage, which, when purpose, he could to excellent account. was the reigning favourite of Philadelphia Theatre longer period than any to city, and with a reputation all might envy.

In social relations he was the model what a gentleman be, a husband, an affectionate father, a friend, and a truly honest. He died Harrisburg, been playing, at his son's theatre, but no spot where the remains of of brightest of profession.

"Alas! Yorick?"

During no period of my theatrical life did I work harder or receive money than during the season under Mr. Pratt's management of 1829 and 1830; it was no uncommon occurrence to appear in two new characters on the evening, on more than occasion, "three." long there appeared the slightest chance of resuscitation to the of the Chouteau-street Theatre, the laboured diligently, but when after all their toil, no money could obtained for weeks in succession, one by one dropt from their allegiance; for myself, I abandoned the theatre in despair, my benefit alone preserving me and my family from actual starvation. In this situation of affairs, I turned my thoughts to my old vocation of selling lottery tickets, and on the 23d of March,

1836, much to the annoyance of many of my professional brethren, I issued the following advertisement:—

"STARVED OUT !

"The unprecedented depression of Theatricals in the city of Philadelphia having deprived the managers of [redacted] different [redacted] of the means of paying their actors, or fulfilling their contracts, the profession no longer affords the means of procuring the humble fare of bread and cheese for the support of a family. Under these circumstances, [redacted] I compelled to seek for other means of subsistence, and to [redacted] reluctantly—

"Othello's occupation's gone!"

"F. C. Wemyss, grateful for past favours, again solicits [redacted] patronage [redacted] friends and the public, having opened a lottery office in [redacted] Arcade, No. 34, East Avenue, and 35, [redacted] Avenue, where, by strict attention, he hopes to merit support. Having been three years out of business, he [redacted] only at present refer to prizes sold in days of 'Adel lang Syne;' and many whose fortunes have been amply increased by their purchases from him, can bear testimony that Wemyss' office was fortune's own abode. [redacted] [redacted] a [redacted] pressing invitation to her, and doubts not she will return to her old quarters."

[Here followed a scheme of the Union Canal Lottery.]

[redacted] heading of this advertisement gave particular offence to the managers. To their remonstrances I could only answer, Is [redacted] not true? and then laughingly using the language of Shakspeare, say, "I am not bound to please thee with my (answers) advertisements."

I [redacted] made known my [redacted] for acting, to be [redacted] [redacted] per night, payable [redacted] advance, for any parts I [redacted] previously acted, and ten dollars if required to study a [redacted] character. Although I could receive money from the treasury, as a regularly engaged actor, yet [redacted] arrangement yielded me an average of from fifteen to twenty dollars per week, [redacted] [redacted] most seasonable supply to aid my new business. It was thus I became a member (for occasional aid only,) of the seceders, who opened the Washington Theatre, in York Road; and [redacted] who witnessed [redacted] performance of [redacted] comedies of "John Bull," [redacted] "The Rivals," left [redacted] delighted [redacted] the representation. Mr. Duff, [redacted] Wemyss, Mr. Foote, [redacted] Clarke, Mr. Webb, Mr. Logan, Mrs. Wheatley, Mrs. [redacted] ney, Mr. and Mrs. O. Durang, were members of the company. It was here that Mr. David Ingersoll, a young man of much promise, and well known in New York as an excellent actor, made his first public effort. Dissipation finished his career at an early age, which common prudence would have made a brilliant one. What a pity it is, that while so many actors have imitated Mr. E. Forrest on the stage, so few have imitated his admirable example of sobriety and economy, in private life. Mr. A. Adams, his only successful rival, would have possessed a fortune equal to the great tragedian, had his conduct off the stage been marked by the same correct demeanour.

"Alas! that a man should put an enemy of outrages upon public decency, too common of London, but which had never been attempted in America, was perpetrated at the Walnut-Street Theatre, in the production of a piece under the title of the "Mail Robbers," while Porter and Wilson were on the stage for their lives, for the commission of the crime of robbing the United States mail; both being found guilty and executed. Can anything be more revolting than making a subject the theme of representation, the victims were awaiting the penalty to the crimes, the community whose they outraged. Such is the which the of the city interfered, to prohibit an exhibition; that they did not do so, is a lasting disgrace. The crime, however, did not go unpunished.
In his own mouth, he steal away his brains."—SHAKESPEARE.

Mr. S. Chapman, the manager, having, with his artist, visited Turner's Lane, where the robbery was committed, to give an exact scenic view of the spot, contracted a violent cold, which terminated his existence on the 16th of May, 1830. By a singular fatality, his last appearance upon the stage was in the character intended to represent Porter, who was afterwards hanged. Poor Chapman! he was a man of varied talent, of much literary knowledge, and an universal favourite: with all his faults, the stage "could have better spared a better man." Had he lived, he would have produced an entire revolution in the minor drama of America; with his death, ceased the prosperity of the theatre; he is buried in Ronaldson's cemetery, where a neat monument records his memory, erected by friends he had gained during a sojourn of two years and eight months in the city of Philadelphia.

The death of Mr. Chapman proved the service that a well regulated theatrical fund must be to actors in distress. No sooner was it known, than a special meeting was summoned, and the following letter was addressed to his widow:—

the death of Samuel Chapman, lingered open to the last, closing ■■■■ of debt which forced the managers ■■■■ under the benefit of the ■■■■ laws.

If ■■■■ of 1838 and 1839, ■■■■ the ■■■■ of Wood, Warren, Blake, (Ainslee,) Inslee, and Wemyss, 1839 and 1830 terminated the career of B. T. Pratt, A. J. Philips, Green, Edmonds, and poor Sam Chapman; for their successors, I refer you ■■■■ the ■■■■ chapter.

CHAPTER XXI.

Campaign of 1830 and 1831. Non-payment of Salaries. Charles Korn. Master Burke. The ■■■■ System.—Rush-light. ■■■■ D'Jick, ■■■■ great actor. Tyler, in the "School of ■■■■"

THE campaign of 1830-'31, was opened on Saturday, the 28th of August, by the Chapman family at the Walnut Street Theatre with the "Heir at Law," and "Love Laughs ■■■■ Locksmiths." ■■■■ company was really one of talent, and merited ■■■■ better fate than non-payment of salaries.

But novelty, new faces, strange faces, has ■■■■ been the cry in Philadelphia when ■■■■ is proposed, which desire is no ■■■■ complied with, than a wish succeeds for the ■■■■ of their old favourites, whose absence is lamented when too late, and comparisons instituted by no ■■■■ favourable to the new comers. It appears almost incredible, after the misery of the spring and summer ■■■■ of 1830, that ■■■■ capable actor should have been found hardy enough to venture upon management; yet all three of the theatres were occupied, and ready for a fair start in this road ■■■■ ruin.

The present season was marked by the appearance of the smallest and the largest star that ever graced the same theatre—Master Burke, the Lilliputian musician and actor, ■■■■ Mademoiselle D'Jick, ■■■■ elephant of Siam, who ■■■■ appeared ■■■■ Atoh ■■■■ Theatre, which opened on ■■■■ of August, under the management of Archer, Maywood ■■■■ Walton, with ■■■■ "Bride of Lammermoor," ■■■■ "Turn ■■■■;" Hyatt and Kilner being added to the names ■■■■ to the citizens of Philadelphia.

Davis, of ■■■■ French opera, opened ■■■■ Theatre for a short season.

Messrs. Lamb and Coyle made me an overture to enter into partnership ■■■■ in ■■■■ Chestnut Street Theatre, on ■■■■ take the stage management. I recommended Mr. W. B. Wood for that situation, as ■■■■ believed his name associated with the ■■■■ was most likely to ■■■■ support of fashionable circles in aid of the drama; but the taste, which appeared extinct, for theatrical representations, reserved for appearance of Fanny Kemble, at a period, of whom hereafter. I declined offer, but accepted engagement in theatre, which opened on Monday, the 18th of October, with "at 1.10," the "Lottery Ticket," and the "Young Widow;" an address, written by W. C. Bridges, was spoken by me, of which I regret I did not preserve a copy. John Mills Brown and Mrs. C. Young the only strangers of any reputation who possessed the charm of novelty, although the season commenced very prosperously.

The first announcement which excited attention, of Mr. Charles Kean, (of the great tragedian.) at Arch Theatre, on the 23rd of September, performed part of Richard Third. The house filled, and I took my seat in the boxes, with a feeling regret that Mr. C. Kean had not selected the Chestnut Theatre to make his first appearance. Old recollections, the warm friendship I entertained for his father, rendered anxious for his success. I left the theatre with a feeling of disappointment, and a conviction that the mantle of the father had not descended upon the shoulders of the son. The performance was weak throughout, painfully reminding the auditor of his father's excellence, only to reveal his own of physical power to act such a part Richard the Third; it a failure which subsequent effort could eradicate. And had Mr. C. Kean's pretensions to be ranked among the actors of the British stage rested upon his first visit the United States, his claim could not have been recognized; his name alone toleration conceded, to which, he possessed a rival in the person of Mr. R. Forrest, a young man of his rapidly rising in popularity with country- and between whom himself comparisons were instituted on all occasions. was, therefore, a fortunate circumstance reputation, that he paid United States a second visit when position an actor definitively fixed, but never prove an attractive star. In the Atlantic cities he played Richard, Sir Giles Overreach, Shylock, Othello, Hamlet, and Reuben Hearsay. On the 14th December,

MATTHEW BURKE,

the Irish Roccus, appeared for the first time in Philadelphia, at the Arch Street Theatre, character of Young Norval, in "Douglas," leading the overture of Gray Mannerings, and playing Dr. O'Toole, in "Irish Tutor." The house presented any thing but a flattering appearance, the Philadelphians having no peculiar relish for precocity; but his success was great, and the remainder of his engagement must have amply compensated for any little mortification he may have experienced on his first reception. The sweet tones of his violin, and the graceful manner in which he handled his bow, created a sensation in the musical world. He left the city with his pocket well filled with dollars, and a reputation which rendered it difficult to procure a seat in the boxes, when he returned. {Against his acting I must be allowed to enter a protest—it was so inferior to that of Clara Fisher at a much earlier age, it excited no astonishment, and was thence to the audience, but to his musical abilities I render a willing homage. He was a prodigy, deserving the success which crowned his efforts.

A new tragedy, from the pen of [redacted] Paul Brown, Esq., a distinguished member of the Philadelphia bar, was produced at the Chestnut Street Theatre, on the 14th of December, 1830, entitled “Sertorius.” Booth played the hero in a manner which would have commanded success for any piece; the beautiful poetry of this play, flowing from his lips [redacted] have gratified the fastidious [redacted] any author—how, then, [redacted] have delighted the [redacted] The play [redacted] action—there was too much declamation. It was received by a [redacted] able audience with every mark of success, and repeated [redacted] times, being [redacted] only by the [redacted] Mr. Booth’s engagement—another of the blessings of the star system entailed upon managers, who are thus prevented from reaping the harvest of their exertions, even from a successful play, the engagement of the star elsewhere precluding the possibility of prolonging an engagement.

Richard Penn Smith also produced a new piece, for Christmas Night, founded on Cooper’s novel of the Water Witch, in which I had to play Tom Tiller. Mr. Young, for whom the part was originally compiled, returning it to the managers [redacted] eleventh hour, as too long, he being utterly unable [redacted] commit the words to memory. [redacted] faculty, in that respect, being notorious throughout the profession, it was [redacted] to [redacted] I could not do it, and I was unwilling to say I would not; but after labouring successfully at my task, I could not [redacted] [redacted] mortification to find [redacted] [redacted] only person in [redacted] piece [redacted] with the language of the author. Instead of receiving help from those who had less to learn, I [redacted] obliged to prompt others, and bear the whole burthen of a three [redacted] melo-drama on my own shoulders. It was a fortunate circumstance [redacted] [redacted] holiday [redacted] [redacted] composed our [redacted] [redacted] were too noisy to observe our delinquency, or the piece would have met a different fate. It passed [REDACTED] with collet, and then passed on to the managers' shelves.

On the 8th of January, Charles [REDACTED] an engagement at the Chestnut Street Theatre, but the error he had [REDACTED] [REDACTED] not choosing it as his first ground, was not to be repaired. His houses were worse than he attracted at the Arch Street Theatre. Throughout this season, [REDACTED] stars were continually running from [REDACTED] house to the other; [REDACTED] that, as Jack [REDACTED] had it, "you know not where to harbour them."

Mr. [REDACTED] Forrest, after playing at the Arch [REDACTED] Theatre, also came for a few nights to the Chestnut Street Theatre; so also Madam Pearson, Hackett, Finn, Mrs. Austin, and others.

On the 10th of January, 1831, I revived, [REDACTED] my benefit, [REDACTED] good old comedy of the "Suspicious Husband," and a new piece entitled "Free and Easy," heading my play-bill thus:

No Stars,
But a host of approved	Rush-lights.
Wood,	Wemyss,
Roberts,	J. M. Brown,
Young,	Green,
Mrs. Darley,	Mrs. Wood,
Mrs. Young,	Mrs. Willis,
Miss Kerr,	Mrs. F. Durang.

Rushlights! Most of them [REDACTED] stars than [REDACTED] who grace the play-bills nightly, [REDACTED] their [REDACTED] in large letters, in these degenerate times. The play was judiciously chosen, well acted, and presented to a fashionable audience, but the manager pocketed the proceeds, kindly allowing me to call [REDACTED] my [REDACTED] to make up the deficiency, by taking a second [REDACTED]. This was the first time I ever knew the proceeds of an actor's benefit to remain unpaid; [REDACTED] [REDACTED] always been considered a trust, sacred in [REDACTED] hands of [REDACTED] manager. Misfortune may render a man unable to [REDACTED] [REDACTED] payments [REDACTED] weekly salary, but to [REDACTED] [REDACTED] pay over the proceeds of an actor's benefit, is a crime, a breach of trust of the blackest kind, seldom practised by the most unprincipled [REDACTED].

On the 5th of April, I appeared at the Walnut Street Theatre, in the character of Tyke, in the "School of Reform," which I [REDACTED] promised to act, to oblige a very worthy friend [REDACTED] mine, (whose name I do not feel authorized to mention,) [REDACTED] whom I once stated I thought I could play the part.

Before the curtain rose, I [REDACTED] willingly have paid fifty dollars to have escaped the effect of my folly, in making a rash promise. Fancy a light comedian, held in high estimation by the audience of the Chestnut Street Theatre, attempting to perform the most difficult part in the range of domestic tragedy, requiring a broad Yorkshire dialect ■ afford even a chance of success. By one of those freaks, which frequently make or mar an actor, I was successful, beyond ■ most sanguine expectations.

■ difficulty of the task ensured my triumph: the audience expected, and came prepared, ■ witness a failure; but when ■ curtain fell on the second act, the applause ■ so hearty that I felt I was sure of ■. When I appeared again, I was greeted by three distinct rounds of applause, and was offered, ■ the close of the performance, ■ hundred dollars to repeat the character on the following Saturday night.

■ much was said out of the theatre about this performance, ■ I ■ in treaty with Maywood and company, Rowbotham made a positive stipulation, that I should open in Tyke, which I agreed to do, on condition that he gave ■ Saturday night ■ the Walnut Street Theatre ■ my benefit, ■ not ask me to repeat the part.

My second attempt was by no ■ as successful as my first; ■ weeks had elapsed, during which time all ■ theatrical friends had been urging me ■ turn my attention to what are termed the "Heavy Countrymen," of which Tyke is the best specimen. The audience expected too much, and ■ disappointed. In ■ instance they ■ agreeably surprised, and in the second, proportionately disappointed, although they warmly applauded the effort. Three times in the course of my theatrical career, I have received the marked approbation of the audience, for acting parts totally ■ to ■ usual cast of characters, and from which I expected to reap anything else than reputation. Dr. Cantrell, in the "Hypocrite," Talc, in the "School of Reform," and Old Nelson, ■ "Jonathan Bradford," will ever ■ remembered by me, as ■ which proved to the audience I was capable of affording ■ amusement in a more varied line of ■ drama, if I chose ■ turn my attention to them.

The seventh of May, 1831, is deserving of record, as being the day which gave birth to the firm of Maywood & Co., the only management assuming anything like stability since the days of Warren and Wood; they opened the Walnut Street Theatre with the "Foundling of the Forest," and the "Sleep Walker," ■ remaining open until the 31st day of July, at which time they obtained possession of the Chestnut Street Theatre

XXII.

Management. Henry Armstrong, Forrest and the Gladiator.
Warren's last appearance as an Actor.

of 1831—32, opened by Maywood and Co., on Saturday, the 25th day of August, at the Walnut Street Theatre, with the melo drama of the "Heart of Mid Lothian," and the farce of "Raising the Wind," in which I portrayed Jeremy

On the Monday following, Messrs. Jones, Duffy, and Forrest, opened Arch Street Theatre, with Sheridan's comedy of "The Rivals," and "Black-Eyed Susan."

On the 17th of October, the Chestnut Street Theatre once more opened its doors for the season, announcing as stars engaged, Mr. Sinclair, Miss Hughes, Master Burke, Mr. F. Kean, Mr. Anderson, Madame Bartolozzi, Mr. Funn, Mr. Hackett, Mrs. Barrymore, Miss Farn Fisher, and Mr. Booth.

They say the first blow is half the battle: but should that blow fall, what becomes of the aggressor? The first star presented to the public was who announced to play Francis Schalkdencoe, in "Rob Roy," on the 17th of October. As a singer, he was the pride of the London stage; the successful rival of Bruburn, whose triumph in English music, in conjunction with Miss Stephens (the Countess of Essex) in "Guy Mannering" and "Rob Roy," form the subject of many a pleasing reminiscence in musical world. Thirty nights announced as the utmost limit to which his present visit to the United States could possibly extend, (at least so said the play-bills, which, the newspapers, avowed). Prices of admission were raised to the old standard, and public expectation wrought up to the highest pitch. This unnatural excitement proved the grave of his reputation: he was a victim to his own wreck. Former self, he was called upon to realize extravagant expectations, and failed lamentably, sealing the of the Chestnut Street season, whose prospects appeared so brilliant. His voice had fled; in vain he endeavoured through the columns of the papers, to persuade the public he sung as well as ever he—the man was there, 'tis true, but the voice, which a crowded theatre in breathless silence to hear, "Pray, Goody, please to moderate," was gone; his was passed, and he was rapidly descending to that position, where managers become fertile in framing excuses to avoid entering into engagements which they knew must fail. It is a source of regret to the admirers of Mr. Sinclair—"and their name is legion,"—that he did not retire when he could have done so with éclat. His visit to the United States was injudicious; he must have been aware that his powers were impaired, if not entirely lost, and that no recollection of what he had been could be brought forward to shield him before the audience of the New World, where he presented himself as a candidate for public approbation, relying upon the force of his reputation for a favourable reception, furnishing another proof of the tenacity with which public performers cling to that applause they have been accustomed to receive, until sounds of an opposite nature awake them to the unpleasant truth, that their attraction is gone, fled like a dream, never to return.

MR. SINCLAIR

I have heard Mr. Sinclair sing, when admiring crowds could scarce obtain admission within the spacious walls of Covent Garden Theatre; when his name was sufficient to fill a concert room to overflowing, and his ballads the theme of praise on every tongue; but I should never have recognised the gentleman who appeared this evening as Francis Osbaldiston, as the John Sinclair, claimed as the Scottish Minstrel, and the King of Song.

The failure of this, their first star, and the greatest name they could offer, had a most sinister effect on the future prospects of the managers during the season.

Messrs. Jones, Duffey, and Forrest were active and enterprising opponents, watching to take advantage of every false move their adversaries might make. Mr. E. Forrest played "Metamora" on the same evening at the Arch Street Theatre, which terminated so fatally for the treasury of the Chestnut Street, and on the following Monday they produced Dr. Bird's tragedy of the "Gladiator," (24th of October). The reception it met with was enthusiastic, and notwithstanding the opinion of the London critics to the contrary, its success was well deserved. As a first attempt at dramatic composition, it reflected honour on its author. Accustomed as an actor is to striking scenes, I was taken by surprise, at the effect produced at the closing of the second act, the rising of the Gladiators in the arena, and the disposition of the characters as the act drop fell, I do not believe was ever surpassed in any theatre in the world.

But the author committed a blunder in composition: unless he was prepared with something more vigorous, he should have ended his plot here, instead of commencing it. The very excellence of the situation and action just depicted; prepared you for something more startling yet [redacted] while [redacted] third act, which immediately follows, is the worst act of the whole play, as if the author [redacted] exhausted himself in the commencement of his task; and instead of rising gradually to the point of excellence he here acquired, he sinks below mediocrity, and, with the exception of the description of Pharusius and the death of Spartacus, he never again rises above it.

It would [redacted] superfluous to say one word on the subject of Mr. E. Forrest's performance of Spartacus: [redacted] was [redacted] performance of melo-dramatic tragedy, to the excellence of which every frequenter of the theatres bears willing testimony. J. R. Scott merited the thanks of the author for his performance of Pharusius, and the managers for the scenery and dresses. The play was produced in a style worthy of the reputation of [redacted] actor, by whose liberality it was presented to the public. It was repeated [redacted] almost every night during Mr. E. [redacted] engagement, and retains its popularity [redacted] present day (1843).

[redacted] the 14th of September, I had a [redacted] understanding [redacted] Maywood & Co., which led to my retirement from the Ch [redacted] Street Theatre; the cause, an attempt to forfeit me one dollar, by the management, for having prevented (by the loss of a night's sleep,) the necessity of their char [redacted] the pieces [redacted] nounced for performance. Without the [redacted] notice [redacted] Green-room, but [redacted] the mere supposition that I had played the part, Mr. Rowbotham, the stage-manager, sent my name to the press for Mandoville, in the "Young Widow," not only a long but a [redacted] part; the first intimation I had of [redacted] was the printed bill, at half past ten o'clock, on the evening preceding. I [redacted] Rowbotham, at once, I would not do it. [redacted] (many might think a fortunate) faculty [redacted] committing a given number of [redacted] memory in [redacted] space of time, was too well known to the managers, who, after many kind phrases, and the "blarney" which usually proves successful with an actor, when a manager is anxious to coax him into a disagreeable thing, I agreed to attempt it, on condition that a rehearsal was called at one o'clock. The performance of the evening, in which I sustained a principal part, was not concluded until half-past twelve o'clock, when, with the prompt-book in my possession, I left the theatre, not to seek repose, but to read incessantly for three hours. By four o'clock, I had completed my task, and retired [redacted] bed, when in the morning I was summoned to attend a ten o'clock rehearsal. Notwithstanding this was a violation of terms on which I consented to study the character, it was my intention to have been there—accident alone prevented it. "I fell asleep, and did not awake until after eleven o'clock. Finding it impossible to be at the theatre in time to rehearse a piece, which does not occupy an hour in acting, I devoted the forenoon to reading the part attentively, and to my great satisfaction, found I was perfect. I told Rowbotham the cause of my absence, who laughed, and thanked me at the end of the performance, with the remark, 'I do not know how the devil I got the words into your head.' Having fulfilled my promise, I could scarcely expect punishment, when I was fairly entitled to my services; therefore, on Saturday, I was not only surprised, but indignant, to find a dollar retained from my salary, with no notice but a small piece of paper, explaining the cause, which read thus:—"Mr. Wetmore, one dollar, keeping the prompt book of the 'Young Widow,' from rehearsal." I refused to submit to this act of injustice; the managers seemed to regard it as a good joke; but I had no inclination to be joked out of my money. I made a formal demand of the dollar, which being refused, I told them that I would commence a suit for its recovery, if it cost me twenty times the amount. I received a reply from Mr. Maywood, stating that the rules and regulations of the theatre were imperative, and binding upon all; that they would be enforced in every case, without reference to persons; that the money could not be returned; that I was at liberty to take my course I might think proper. I therefore, forthwith, issued a summons against Maywood, Rowbotham and Pratt, for the enormous sum of one dollar, unlawfully by them detained. Before the day fixed for the hearing before the magistrate, they cooled a little. Fearing to risk an exposure which must have proved most discreditable to them, they sent me the money, with the costs, to the magistrate's office, and contented themselves with addressing me a letter, stating my services would not be required in the theatre at the expiration of the present week. Nothing would have pleased me better than such an arrangement at the commencement of the quarrel, for I never could forgive the meanness of the managers; but now, on my character as an actor, I was required to submit to no arrangement which could appear to place the managers in the right, and myself in the wrong, in a cause so oppressive and tyrannical. I refused to accept of my discharge, as it was termed; but the breach of contract, it was really was; my engagement being for three months, and I was for one week—we tried the question also, which was decided in my favour, by arbitration. I returned to the theatre, on the 27th of October, after an absence of four weeks, during which, they had to pay me my stipulated income, for doing nothing; until their inability to pay their salaries, left me at liberty to turn the tables, and discharge them from being my masters, instead of their discharging me as their servant. The hostility thus engendered, continued in active operation ■■■ years. Considering Mr. Pratt ■■■ been my partner; ■■■ Mr. Maywood, the acting manager of the Baltimore and Washington Theatres, on my account; and ■■■ Rowbotham was the stage manager of ■■■ creating, ■■■ Chesnut Street Theatre, ■■■ was, even if in ■■■ wrong, from ■■■ associations, entitled to some little courtesy. ■■■ when, by express stipulation of engagement, I ■■■ exempted from ■■■ tending more than ■■■ rehearsal of a ■■■ piece, ■■■ not bound to attend ■■■ old ■■■ at all, except at my own pleasure ■■■ convenience, I ■■■ at a loss ■■■ account for this transaction. It ■■■ true, Mr. Rowbotham ■■■ he had selected me ■■■ an example, that he might say ■■■ others—"Why, ■■■ Wemyss. How then ■■■ you expect to escape?" Good logic, this; but applied to ■■■ bad subject, when he proposed ■■■ make me ■■■ victim to frighten others into the performance ■■■ their duty.

Early in November, I received from Warren the following letter, dated Baltimore:—

"DEAR ■■■:—

"■■■ ■■■ you about—are you, a Walnut Street play-actor, or ■■■ Chestnut Street play-actor, or no play-actor at all? Do write, and let me hear the news. Do you think there is a possibility of my acting at either of the ■■■ in your city, during the present season?

"Yours, very truly,

(Signed,) "WILLIAM WARREN."

I showed this letter to Mr. Maywood, and the result ■■■ an offer of an engagement at the Chesnut Street Theatre, ■■■ last he ever fulfilled, commencing with Palstaff, on ■■■ 10th ■■■ November, 1831, and terminating ■■■ the 25th of ■■■ month, when, for ■■■ benefit, he appeared as Sir Robert Bramble, in the "Poor Gentleman." I played Frederick, and in the last ■■■ of the play it ■■■ evident ■■■ ■■■ gentleman's memory was ■■■ling. In the beginning ■■■ the fifth act, he suddenly laid ■■■ hand upon my shoulder, ■■■ said, "Frank, lead ■■■ off the stage, for I do not know ■■■ I am talking about." ■■■ finished the part, committing blunder upon blunder, until it became evident to ■■■ audience, who kindly cheered the ■■■ moments of ■■■ public ■■■ their long and continued approbation. He ■■■ again—and thus closed the ■■■ ■■■ William Warren, one ■■■ greatest favourites, both ■■■ a ■■■ ■■■ actor, the Philadelphia stage ■■■ possessed. As ■■■ manager, ■■■ long and ably directed the theatre ■■■ its brightest days; universally respected, ■■■ misfortunes ■■■ latter part of his life, ■■■ with universal commiseration, but little assistance. He died in Baltimore, on Friday, October 19, 1832, aged 66 years, regretted by those friends who best knew his worth, and remembered by all, as the only representative of Shakspeare's inimitable Sir John Falstaff. The last time his name was announced, was at the Arch Street Theatre, on the 8th of December, when he intended to take leave of the audience in an address, in the character of Falstaff. He was too ill to appear, and I regret to state the amount of the house for his last benefit, was a disgrace to the frequenters of the theatre—leaving him, in sickness, to regret he had suffered his name to be announced, and that his friends, in the hour of his utmost need, had entirely deserted him.

MISS CLIFTON

appeared as Lady Macbeth, on the 10th of December. She failed to excite the slightest attention, possessing no requisite for an actress but personal appearance, and deserving only of notice, as the first lady belonging to the American stage, who was born in the United States, and put forth pretensions to be considered a star. Her first benefit in Philadelphia, took place at the Chesnut Street Theatre, and (with the exception of Madame Heloise) was the worst house ever seen upon such an occasion, within the walls. The performance was "Bertram," and the "Lottery Ticket;" Hamblin playing Bertram to her Imogene. It is an ungracious task, to speak of any lady in other terms than those of praise, therefore I must be excused from entering into any further discussion, upon Miss Clifton's merits as an actress. She played Astarté, in London, in Lord Byron's "Manfred;" and lately supports Mr. Forrest during his star engagements; but owes her position entirely to the system of newspaper puffing, so fatal to the real interests of the drama.

On the 17th of January, 1832, R. T. Conrad produced a five act tragedy of some merit, for Mr. Murdoch's benefit, under the title of "Conrad of Naples," at the Arch Street Theatre. Murdoch as the hero, acquired a goodly share of reputation, and certainly acted this part better than J. E. Scott, who afterwards attempted it.

I must not forget to mention a row which took place on the 17th of December, at the Walnut Street Theatre, in consequence of Mr. Hamblin breaking down in the character of Richard the Third, his old enemy, the asthma, preventing him from proceeding beyond the third act. An apology was made to the audience, who quietly sat out the new piece of "The Evil Eye;" but when the curtain rose upon the farce of "Raising the Wind," in which I had to perform Jeremy Diddler, the audience gave strong proof of their determination to see the last two acts of "Richard the Third." From the violent disapprobation, I ventured to expostulate with Mr. Rowbotham upon the folly of attempting to proceed; but he told me I was afraid—I said "No; but the actors are." "Go on!" said he. "Up with the curtain," said I. But no sooner had we commenced the second act, and the determination of the management to proceed in spite of opposition manifest to the audience, than some gentleman blackguard, (aside) throw a large piece of plaster, extracted from the roof of the pit passage, with some force upon the stage. It fell at the feet of M<sup>rs</sup>. Charles Green, who was acting Peggy, and whose face miraculously escaped contact. Her husband, who was on the stage, representing the character of Old Plainway, in an instant seized the offending missile, and hurled it back upon the audience with the emphatic phrase, "the man that throwed it, was a blackguard and a coward." A general ensued, in which stoves were turned, hot coals distributed, and the melee ended by leaving the audience in the dark, the lights being rapidly extinguished. How many black eyes, and how many threats uttered I stop to detail. That Green was wrong in throwing a handful of rubbish among the audience, is not the question. He was undoubtedly right, in protecting his wife from insult; and his noble expression, that he cared for no danger; he only wished to be placed before the scoundrel who threw the plaster, or any one who would justify him; and as far as strength remained, he would protect a woman against the whole assembled crowd, after other, gained him a host of friends, and saved the manager much annoyance from his ill-judged perseverance.

Hughes appeared at the Chestnut Theatre, as a vocalist: her success was not equal to her merit. Blanchard, one of the glories of the British stage, in her best days, also appeared on the 23rd of January, at the Chestnut Street Theatre, which was now opened; one company doing duty, playing at both theatres on the same night; very amusing to the actors, not unprofitable to the managers, but decidedly deprecated by the audience, who could not discover why an actor, passing from the corner of Sixth and Walnut Street, to Sixth and Chestnut Street, should be worth double the price of admission, in a farce, which they had paid to see him in a full play, in the early part of the evening.

Blanchard opened as Don Lewis, in "Love makes a Man." To say that it was an excellent piece of acting, would only be to reiterate what every body, conversant with the stage, has already said; but I wanted actors of the same school, now, I am sorry to say, fast fading from existence in the counterpane.

The play is ~~known~~ to the present generation; and Mr. Blanchard's failure to attract was owing to a want of merit on his part, but a want of judgment to appreciate such acting by the audience, who prefer "Napoleon," "Zantha," or any dramatic representation, where the eye can be gratified, to ~~any~~ dialogue ~~and~~ repertee, which forms the essence of comedy. By ~~the~~ ~~old~~ authors, therefore, Edmund Gouffe, with his imitation of the Monkey tribe, would fill the theatre, while an effort "to raise the genius, and to mend the heart," would fail.

The 18th of February, 1852, should be ~~marked~~ in the dramatic calendar with "a white stone," having introduced a young lady of superior talent, in the person of who made her first appearance on any stage, in the Arch Street Theatre, in the character of Clari, taking not only the audience, but the actors, by surprise, who, while congratulating her upon her merited success, felt that the profession had acquired a gem of talent of the highest order. To Mr. Hamblin the public were indebted for the introduction of this young lady, whose short but brilliant career forms an epoch in the history of the American stage. From the night of her debut, she rose in favour with the audience, who felt justly proud of their countrywoman; until the citizens of New York and Boston, confirming the opinion of the critics of Philadelphia, placed her, by unanimous consent, at the head of the arduous profession she had chosen. Had her life been spared, she would have created in London as great a sensation in the dramatic world, as did Miss Fanny Kemble in the United States, or Madame Rachel in France. Her person was small; her features not remarkable for beauty, yet bore the stamp of intellect, which, when lighted up by the enthusiasm of her assumed character, captivated the hearts of the audience. She died before her reputation had reached its zenith, lamented by all who knew her, occupying without a rival the proud station of the first actress in America.

MISS VINCENT,

It is singular, that while female talent, (previous to the appearance of Miss Fanny Kemble,) was at the lowest ebb upon the London stage, the native actresses of the United States should have presented a galaxy of talent, in the persons of Miss Vincent, Miss Ann Waring, Mrs. Richardson, (Miss E. Jefferson,) Mrs. Willis, (late Miss Warren,) all the Placide family, Miss Pelby, (Mrs. Anderson,) Mrs. Kent, Miss Mary Duff, Miss Riddle, Mrs. Flynn, and others. Had the managers of the London Theatres been aware of its existence, many would have been translated to the great metropolis, as attractions of rare value. I have been surprised that Mr. Price' while [redacted] the American stage with European talent' did not attempt the task for which he was so well qualified, of introducing some of these young ladies to a London audience. The speculation would have been a profitable one, for talent of the highest order in England is always sure to command success.

The season of 1831 and 1832, was also marked by another addition of value, in better known as [redacted] Hill, who, from a very humble position in the Arch Street Theatre, in which he was frequently insulted by the derision and disapprobation of the audience, suddenly became a star, and what is more extraordinary, a good one too. Discharged in disgrace from his situation, for [redacted] to assist as a courtier, in the coronation scene of [redacted] "Exile," glad to [redacted] from [redacted] audience who [redacted] him, desperate in his circumstances, and reckless of consequences, [redacted] applied to Mr. Simpson, [redacted] [redacted] Park Theatre, [redacted] York, [redacted] permission to attempt a Yankee character. His [redacted] [redacted] once enabled [redacted] to enter the lists, as a star, to [redacted] [redacted] praise already bestowed upon [redacted] in [redacted] new species of dramatic character. Making [redacted] best of [redacted] [redacted] during Hackett's absence in England, [redacted] proved a [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] that gentleman, on his return, beating him [redacted] his own ground, in the very character of his own creating.

Ma. G. [redacted] Hill,

There is a quiet, natural manner in his acting [redacted] "Down East Yankee," which takes possession of the risible faculties of his audience, giving them full employment during the time he continues on the stage. He is the best representative of what may be styled American comedy. His success in London was a just compliment to his talent. The stage is indebted to him for the possession of several good acting pieces, written to display his peculiarities. He proved for many seasons one of the most attractive stars, until forgetting what he had been, in what he was, he aimed at an unenviable notoriety out of his profession, which has materially injured his prospects of future success. Had Mr. Hill been a man of education, he would have supported himself with credit in the position he had suddenly reached. Having boldly breasted a storm, which threatened to annihilate his claims as an actor, and triumphed over it, an overweening vanity has proved more detrimental to his fame, than all the artifices of his enemies could ever have accomplished.

What an agreeable thing it is for a manager to be compelled, against his will, to retain an actor, and what a pleasant life the actor leads during the period! Every day I experienced some annoyance, of which I could make no formal complaint, but which I knew was done with an intention to promote misunderstanding. Mrs. Knight being engaged at the Chestnut Street Theatre, wished to open in Kate Ostrin; knowing I was a member of the company, and remembering the manner in which this piece was received on its first representation, naturally wished me to act Charles Paragon. I had caught a severe cold, which, affecting my throat, compelled me to remain in the house, when I received a letter from Mr. Maywood, requesting I would make an effort to come out upon the present occasion. I replied that I would do so, on condition I was not requested to act any other part on that evening, as I did not feel sufficiently recovered to resume my duty in the theatre. With this understanding, I suffered my name to be announced. Mr. Booth having arrived unexpectedly, "Hamlet" was substituted for the play, in which I had usually acted Ostrin. Much to my mortification, I found my name in the play-bill, but was assured by Mr. Rowbotham, the stage-manager, it was a mistake, and that Mr. Mercer would act the part. I was not even called upon to rehearse it, and certainly should not have consented to stand upon the stage, an inactive spectator, for half an hour, with a bare neck and a ulcerated sore throat. But so good an opportunity to mortify me was not to be lost. At the end of the third act of the tragedy, Mr. Maywood came to me to know whether I intended to play Ostrin; I replied decidedly not; when Mr. Rowbotham appealed to the audience to be suffered to omit the second scene of the fifth act, in consequence of my indisposition. I was not even aware that such a request had been made, until when discovered as Charles Paragon, I was astonished to hear a few sharp hisses, perfectly unbecomings that they were directed towards me, until after the play was finished, when I was informed of what had taken place. I wasted no words, but sent a card to the newspapers the following morning, in explanation, stating the fault was with the management, not the actor; that the whole part was not forty lines, and that any actor could have easily committed them to memory during the fourth act of the play; that Maywood & Co. were in possession of the knowledge that I would not do it, early in the morning; that I regretted the interruption which had taken place, but that I was certainly not the offending party, having left the sick chamber to aid the management, which had endeavoured to represent me in a most offensive position before the audience; that the Chestnut Street Theatre must indeed be reduced in respectability, when such a request, as to omit a scene with such an actor as Mr. Booth, was resorted to, to gratify a petty spirit of upon an actor. This, however, was the last scene of the contest. I agreed to cancel my engagement, receiving my benefit on the 10th of February, on which occasion I revived Goldsmith's comedy of the "Good-natured Man," and left the Chestnut Street Theatre, after ten years' service.

On the 14th of March, I entered into an engagement with Duffy, Jones, and Forrest, for a few nights at the Arch Street Theatre, opening in Roderigo, in "Othello," and Delaval, in "Matrimony," in which Miss Mary Duff was the Clara. It was during this short engagement as a star in the city of Philadelphia—good-gracious!—that I had the pleasure of acting Count Valentin, in the "Child of Nature," for the benefit of Miss Vincent, who represented Aramanthia with all that simplicity which had already won the hearts of the audience.

Early in the month of April, I paid a flying visit to Albany for twelve nights, where I made my bow as Charles Paragon, in "Perfection," Mrs. Knight being the Kate O'Brien. Mr. E. Forrest, Mrs. Pelby and Miss Pelby, were also there, playing on the same nights, so that if the citizens of Albany did not visit the theatre, it was not for want of attraction.

As the English tragedian Kean, was driven from the American stage, for refusing to act Richard the Third in Boston to a handful of spectators, I was surprised that the American tragedian, E. Forrest, ventured to dismiss an audience, with paucity in numbers he did not choose to interfere with the desire to witness a little fox at the circus, where the "Greek," a well-known billiard-marker in the city, advertised to play Richard the Third. The theatre being closed, the manager, Mr. Forrest, and myself repaired to the circus, without a comment from the disappointed few, who laughed at a good practical joke on a rainy night.

"That such a difference there should be,
Between twiddle dum and twiddle dee."

The fortnight I spent in Albany was delightful recreation, parties of pleasure being formed to Troy, the neighbourhood, every day after rehearsal; and though I return to Philadelphia much richer, I was gratified with the hospitality displayed towards me by the Albanians, and look back with pleasure on my short visit to their city.

On my return, I became regularly attached to the Arch Street company. The season closed on the 18th of June, when, for the first time for several years, the actors were regularly paid, all demands honourably settled, and Messrs. Duffy, Jones and Forrest in high credit both within and without the walls of the theatre. It was at the Arch Street Theatre that Sheridan Knowles' play of the "Hunchback" was first acted in the United States, J. R. Scott being the Master Walter, and Miss Riddle the Julia; the play was as well, if not better acted, as a whole, than I remember to have seen it since, although "the Julia" had not yet given to it the stamp of fashion, which crowded every Theatre in the United States when Fanny Kemble announced to the public.

It was in 1832 that the Anderson Row took place at the Theatre, New York, where the worthy citizens made an unwonted call for Mr. Price, that they might hear him. What the exact nature of Mr. Anderson's offence was, has never been ascertained by the profession; so many rumours have been afloat, that I should be afraid to assign a cause. It is sufficient to record the fact, that he was not permitted to act in the United States—rather a heavy sentence for a private quarrel. But his behaviour was not calculated to conciliate, but rather to irritate his opponents. He paid the penalty of his folly and rashness. The audience lost the opportunity of hearing a clever singer, and he returned to London, to rail against America and its democratic institutions, on all occasions, for the remainder of his life, and then to be forgotten.

It was in the summer of 1832, that better known as Jim Crow, made his appearance at the Walnut-Street Theatre.

MR. THOMAS RICE,

"Did you ever hear of a jolly black diamond?"—Thus sang

This gentleman, whose representation of the character of a negro raised him to affluence, made his first appearance in Philadelphia in the summer of 1832, at the Walnut Street Theatre. The roars of laughter with which his extravaganzas of Jim Crow (the original of which was a negro of Pittsburgh, known as Jim Cuff,) was received, his excellent acting as well as singing, soon induced offers from managers, which filled his pockets and his treasury. He was for a time the "lion" of the minor theatres. With an innate tact for business, he improved the opportunity his popularity afforded, by collecting really beautiful airs which the negro sings while performing his daily labour, and writing himself the "libretto," to introduce a novel species of entertainment, with the imposing title of Ethiopian opera. His "Bons Squash" was an amusing affair, the music truly delightful, and ably executed. The "Vinginy Cupids," although vulgar even to the ears, met a good reception. With this capital, Mr. Rice the Atlantic, and turned the heads of the chimney sweeps and apprentice boys of London, who wheeled about and turned [redacted] and jumped [redacted] Crow, from morning until night, [redacted] annoyance of their masters, but [redacted] great delight of [redacted] cockneys. That his financial affairs have been improved by [redacted] trip there [redacted] doubt, but [redacted] popularity in his native country [redacted] been lost, by his endeavour [redacted] ingraft the English dandy with [redacted] American negro.

In London, where a black man is scarcely seen, it might be remarkably "funny," but the broad caricature of [redacted] American [redacted] was the attraction of Jim Crow at home, who, when [redacted] into an English gentleman, was a [redacted] insipid creature. [redacted] actor, Mr. [redacted] reputation depends upon [redacted] face; and how he contrives to keep it white, might be matter of grave debate, begrimmed as it has been for [redacted] last ten years, [redacted] three hours in each of [redacted] twenty-four.

In private society, Jim Crow is a "first rate" companion: full of anecdote, possessed of vocal abilities, and agreeable in conversation, he makes a valuable member of any social club.

I have paid him many hundred dollars, during my management, and am proud to say, in business he is both just [redacted] liberal, never attempting [redacted] squeeze the [redacted] dollar from [redacted] with whom he [redacted] have contracted [redacted] engagement which proved a losing speculation. His practice on such occasions having generally been voluntarily to resign a portion of his right, by good humouredly observing, in his [redacted] slang:—Lookye here, my master, this has been a bad job—I don't think you ought to suffer to this tune; live and let live is a good motto—hand over——, and I will give you a receipt in full, and wish you better luck another time." [redacted] few dollars remitted, unasked, in this [redacted] have been repayed, with interest, by engagements when he was not actually wanted, but always cheerfully received by those managers who knew how to appreciate an act of kindness cleverly proffered, and when accepted never forgotten.

[redacted] played in "Whirligig Hall," for the managers' benefit, [redacted] of July, closing [redacted] of [redacted] [redacted] with eclat, the last of distinction, [redacted] actors, [redacted] many [redacted]. The [redacted] 1838 witnessed [redacted] general revival of the drama throughout the United States, by the [redacted] of [redacted] Kemble and his daughter, [redacted] [redacted] stars, of more than common brilliance, from England.

As a specimen of [redacted] distress which actors endured during these three years, I give a copy of a letter written by one of [redacted] oldest, [redacted] well as respectable members of [redacted] profession. The name I withhold, in respect to his feelings.

(Directed,) To WARREN, present.

"Sir:—I am in a state of mental agony, debating whether I shall "play the Roman," or "nobly live and see my family starve." Do, for Heaven's sake, render me a small pecuniary assistance, say you think proper—we are destitute. By so doing you will greatly oblige your old friend."

I need scarcely add the letter produced the desired effect, and the gentleman, when I last saw him, was as hearty and good humoured as if he had never known an hour's distress.

XXIV.

Manager of the Season of 1832—33. Rivalry between the Arch and Street. Mr. and Miss Kemble. Dr. Tragedy of "Oroonoko." Disagreeable Mr. Kemble's Acting in different Characters. Death of Mr. Warren. Treatment of his Family by the Managers of the Chestnut Street Theatre. Statement of Facts. Building of a Theatre in Pittsburgh. Offer of its Management. Tragedies by Dr. Ware and James B. Phillips. Fanny Kemble and her Journal.

I now approach the period of a revival, when actors were no longer to be seen lounging about without employment, when really clever actors were eagerly sought for. Jones, Duffy, Forrest had contrived to pay their performers, with regularity; Maywood & Co., by placing their names on two-thirds of new engagements, also received receipts in full, and both parties commenced the season of 1832—33 with every prospect of success. At the Chestnut Street they announced Mr. Charles Kemble, and Miss Kemble, Mr. Sinclair, new family, James Wallack, Vincent, Fearon, Mrs. Austin, as the stars; while at the Arch Street, it was known Mr. B. Forrest was the chief attraction, Mr. and Mrs. Hillson, J. E. Scott, Mr. Hill, Mr. C. Keen, Mr. Cooper, presented a formidable array in opposition.

The campaign was commenced by the Arch Street managers, on Wednesday, the 5th of September, 1832, with the comedy of the "Poor Gentleman," and the farce of "How to Die for Love." The company consisted of Mr. W. Forrest, Duffy, James, Murdoch, Wemyss, J. R. Scott, D. Reed, H. Knight, T. Flacide, Horton, John Green, Thayer, James, Thompson, and Howard; Mrs. Stickney, Miss Riddle, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. H. Knight, Amelia Fisher, Mrs. J. Greene. On Saturday, the 8th, the Chestnut Street opened with Barrymore's military spectacle of "Napoleon," and the free of the "Lottery Ticket," in which Roberts—the true [redacted] of Jefferson, and the only [redacted] deserving of that title, until the arrival of W. E. Barton—played Wormwood. Thus the race [redacted] fairly commenced, each striving for ascendancy; the location of the Chestnut Street Theatre giving it the preference with strangers, because the Arch [redacted] was difficult to be found, unless you left your home for the purpose of going there.

The first grand struggle took place on the 10th of October, when Mr. Charles Kemble made his first appearance in Philadelphia, in the character of Hamlet, at the Chestnut Street Theatre, [redacted] Mr. [redacted] Forrest produced Dr. Bird's tragedy "Oralooa," at [redacted] Arch Street. [redacted] attraction so equally balanced, the town [redacted] fairly divided. Every body was anxious [redacted] [redacted] Kemble, whose reputation [redacted] [redacted] stood higher than that of any performer of [redacted] present day, [redacted] Dr. [redacted] great success [redacted] the "Gladiator," [redacted] cited an [redacted] less degree of curiosity to witness his second [redacted] tempt [redacted] dramatic poet. [redacted] result of this exertion [redacted] the part of the management of both theatres, [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] a succession of nights, during [redacted] respective engagements [redacted] [redacted] Kembles and Mr. E. Forrest.

Dr. [redacted] tragedy of "Oralooa" did not increase [redacted] [redacted] reputation. From [redacted] author [redacted] the "Gladiator" something better [redacted] anticipated; [redacted] [redacted] present play fell below [redacted] previous production of the doctor's [redacted] Neither plot, incident, [redacted] dialogue would [redacted] comparison with [redacted] former self, while [redacted] same glaring error, of producing a climax [redacted] end [redacted] [redacted] act, by the [redacted] of Pizarro, in the banquet hall, beyond which [redacted] could not rise, [redacted] again committed. The [redacted] [redacted] evidently disappointed, and [redacted] [redacted] Forrest judiciously struck [redacted] from the roll of his acting characters, after the first season, conscious it was unworthy the fame of the author, and would never produce anything but mortification [redacted] the actor.

To me the 10th of October, [redacted] the tragedy of "Oralooa," form no pleasing remembrance, although they [redacted] [redacted] be forgotten—having caused me, in mimic fight, (too [redacted] for fancy,) the loss of two front teeth, which Mr. E. Forrest, in the furor of acting, displaced from their original stronghold in my mouth, by a thrust from his sword [redacted] the head of Don Christoval, occasioning some of the wage of the green-room an opportunity of making a bad pun, by declaring [redacted] [redacted] Forrest wished to teach me the proper pronounciation of the name of the play, by forcing me to say to him, "Oh—hey-are-loose-sir!" I confess, I could see little merit in this, but [redacted] served to make a laugh at the time, and perhaps diverted an angry feeling from an awkward accident.

On the 19th of October, Miss Fanny Kemble appeared as Bianca, in "Fazio." Strange as it may appear, connected as I have been with the American stage for twenty years, I never met Mr. Charles Kemble, or his daughter, in the United States, either as actor or manager.

I never had the pleasure of seeing Miss Fanny [redacted] on the stage but once, for a few minutes, in the second act of the "Hunchback," when, in anticipation of a treat of no ordinary nature, I was summoned by the call-boy of the Arch Street Theatre, to which I belonged, by the pleasing intelligence that an unexpected change of performance required my presence there immediately. I left the theatre in a very ill-humour, consequently am unable to offer an opinion upon the acting of the young lady. I therefore take it for granted she was a prodigy. That she revived the [redacted] fortunes of the drama in the [redacted] States, [redacted] [redacted] a doubt; her popularity, and [redacted] [redacted] Kemble, made the theatres once more a fashionable place of amusement.

I had long known Mr. Charles Kemble as the best representative of high comedy belonging to the British stage. He was acting at the Glasgow Theatre, in 1814, when I made my first appearance as an actor. I received from him, at that period, much good advice, which, like all advice offered upon the same subject, was disregarded. But no one who was ever devoted to his profession, can hear the name of Kemble, without pointing to it with a feeling of pride, to prove that the profession of an actor is not incompatible with the bearing and manners of a gentleman. The society of "the Kembles" has been courted by all classes, and their fame is interwoven with the history of the stage for upwards of half a century.

As an actor, Mr. Kemble enjoys a popularity that may well be envied. If I were asked to designate the most finished piece of comedy acting I ever witnessed, I should say the Lovemore of Mr. C. Kemble, in "The Way to Keep Him." There was such an exquisite ease about it, which diverted the mind of the idea of acting, and presented the reality—you forgot Mr. C. Kemble, and [redacted] only before you the heartless man [redacted] fashion he represented. [redacted] he [redacted] without a rival, [redacted] [redacted] all--(managers, [redacted] I say, or)--actors, vanity in- [redacted] him [redacted] attempt Macbeth, Hamlet, [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] Third, recalling the excellence of his brother, (John Kemble,) in those parts; producing a feeling of disappointment, that one so perfect in his own walk of the drama should render himself [redacted] ridiculous, by attempting [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] and his grasp. In Romano, Hamlet, or Lord Hastings, he is equally at home as in comedy; but beyond that, in tragedy, he should attempt no more, and whenever he does, failure is sure to follow.

When he arrived in the United States, he perhaps did wisely to leave to his daughter's excellence, but, Benedict, Marcutio, and Young Hamlet, in my collection, I experienced a feeling of regret that he had placed himself before the public in such a situation from the high position he justly held as a comedian. The delight with which his performance of Marcutio, on the 3d of November, was hailed, and the change of opinion immediately produced in the minds of his audience, as to his ability as an actor, have proved to him that the Philadelphians knew how to appreciate what was really excellent. It was the theme of conversation throughout the city: "you saw Kemble last night?—you lost a treat! I never saw Marcutio acted before!—hope he will repeat it." This enthusiasm, compared with the faint praise reluctantly yielded to Sir Thomas Clifford, and the downright abuse bestowed upon his Hamlet.

On the 19th of October, we received the intelligence of the death of poor Warren. Duffy, Jones, and Forrest, always foremost in deeds of charity, once offered the theatre for a benefit to his widow and family, which took place on the 27th, playing Old Norval, to the Young Norval of William Warren, who made his first appearance upon the stage on the occasion. The conduct of the managers of the Chestnut Street Theatre, of a widely different character towards the widow, one who had directed the theatre in their possession, in its brightest days. Having in my possession a pamphlet, published at the time, I shall transcribe the whole as an act of duty, to the memory of one whom I called friend during life, and the recollection of one whose kindness can never be effaced from the insouciance of those in power, received from the audience, another proof of the ephemeral existence of an actor's popularity. Scarcely cold—and already forgotten,—farewell to thee, Warren.

TO THE MANAGERS OF THE CHESTNUT STREET THEATRE.

Having been advised by many of my late father's friends to withdraw my name from before the public, on the occasion of a benefit announced by the managers of the Chestnut Street Theatre, it became an imperative duty to show the public, before whom my lamented father was for upwards of thirty years an approved actor, the reasons which forced me to adopt my present course.

As soon as my father's death became known in Philadelphia, the managers of the Arch Street Theatre, in compliance with a wish expressed through Mr. Booth, in the kindest manner appropriated an evening for the benefit of my mother; and in order to secure the aid of Mr. Booth, Saturday the 27th of October, was fixed upon. The result is well known. I [redacted] from [redacted] on the Thursday previous, and on [redacted] following evening, Mr. [redacted] of the Chestnut Street Theatre, [redacted] me that the managers [redacted] to give a benefit at their house. This was thankfully accepted on my part, as it was voluntarily offered upon theirs. The success of Mr. Kemble and his daughter, suggested the idea of an application to the former gentleman, for his aid upon the occasion. [redacted] Maywood the acting manager, approved of it, and advised me to do so. My surprise was, therefore great, on the receipt of Mr. Kemble's answer, which follows, to find that the managers had thrown an insurmountable obstacle in the way of my wishes; notwithstanding, it has since appeared that Mr. Kemble played two nights after the expiration of his [redacted] on Thursday, the 31st of November.

COPY OF A LETTER ADDRESSED TO MR. KEMBLE,

"October 29th, 1835.

"SIR:—It is with reluctance that I trespass upon your attention, personally unknown to you as I am; but my motive will, I trust, prove a better excuse than any other I could offer.

"My father, the late William Warren, with whom I believe you were once acquainted, after a series of misfortunes resulting in a total ruin, became through the failure of his health, incapable of assisting his family by his professional exertions. His distress accelerated the work of time, and after a long and painful illness, he expired a few days since at Baltimore, leaving his family dependant upon the resources of those members of it, who in consequence of their youth and peculiar situation during the [redacted] of their father, are now [redacted] some degree unfitted for the task [redacted] suitably providing for them.

"The managers of the Arch Street Theatre, with [redacted] greatest [redacted] name, devoted an evening—Saturday last—to their benefit; and the managers of the Chestnut Street Theatre have [redacted] similar offer; but unless backed by some strong attraction, I fear that it will not be essentially serviceable, and therefore, I have ventured to ask, if it be not incompatible with your engagements, that you, sir, will lend your powerful aid on the occasion.

"You will materially oblige me by leaving a [redacted] containing [redacted] decision, [redacted] the box office of the Chestnut Street Theatre.

"I am, Sir,

"Your most respectfully,

(Signed) "WILLIAM WARREN."

COPY OF MR. KEMBLE'S ANSWER.

Mansion House, Oct. 29th, [redacted]

"SIR:—I am [redacted] with your letter, and regret [redacted] should have made such an application necessary. [redacted] speaking with the manager of the Chestnut Street Theatre upon the subject, he [redacted] me that it is his [redacted] to appropriate a night for the benefit of your family; but that it cannot take place this [redacted] on [redacted] of previous

My engagement in New-York, will take me from Philadelphia in a few days, so that it will not be in my power to comply with your request. Hoping that the public will be more mindful of the pleasure which they have derived from the talents of your father, your letter seems to anticipate, and fill the house to overflowing, on the night devoted to his family,

"I am Sir, your obedient servant,
(Signed) "C. KAKKEL."

COPY OF MR. WARREN'S LETTER TO MAYWOOD & CO.

"Thursday Nov. 1st, 1851

"SIR—As previous arrangements have prevented your devoting a night for my mother's benefit this week, I wish to know definitely, what night next will be convenient to you, and the terms on which it is your intention I should take the house. The earliest night that your arrangements will permit you to dispose of, will be the most suitable. Your answer early enough to afford an opportunity of verifying the result in the papers of to-morrow afternoon, will oblige,

"Yours respectfully,
(Signed) "WILLIAM WARREN."

This letter remains unanswered

On Saturday, about noon, I waited upon Mr. Rowbotham, who was fully informed of the benefit would take place on Tuesday or Thursday, but which, he could not say. He then enquired the terms, to which, he gave me no satisfactory answer, but merely replied, "This is for your benefit, not mine, and you shan't lose anything by it." I saw Mr. R. again at the theatre in the evening, and he there told me that Tuesday was the night determined on. I asked what piece, and he enquired whether I intended to play myself. I told him no. He then said something about "The Good Woman of Seton." I told him I would not advise about the piece, but to play any five act comedy which embraced the strength of the company. This was the last interview I had upon the subject. Although I wished my name to have appeared in the newspapers, of the city on Friday afternoon, their delay rendered it impossible to insert one before Monday, which would have been useless altogether. Thus I was completely ignorant of the success of the benefit, until the playbill appeared:—"Simpson & Co. 'A Hornet' 'The Peasant Boy'!" As the terms of the night were unknown, it was obvious to all my friends, that the benefit was intended merely to produce a nightly charge to the managers, through the use of my mother's name.

A gentleman was deputed to wait upon Mr. Maywood, under these circumstances, and urge a postponement, to which Mr. Maywood replied, such arrangement was impracticable. Mr. Pratt added an objection that it would not be twenty dollars in the house.

Following the advice of my friends, I declined the benefit altogether. Mr. Maywood's opinion being—"That the pieces were as good as any thing that could be done." Mr. Rowbotham—"That I was badly advised." Mr. Pratt—"That I had no claim, but it was a matter of charity altogether."

(Signed) "WILLIAM WARREN."

the Arch Street Theatre as a counter attraction, and answered the purpose of the managers, if not his own.

It was during the month of January I received a letter from my friend, George A. Cooke, of Pittsburgh, requesting me to [redacted] him a plan for the building of a theatre, proposed [redacted] erected in that city of smoke and industry: the management of which he wished me, when finished, to undertake, if I had nothing better in view. I was too glad to accept the proposition, and applied to Mr. Haviland, [redacted] architect, for assistance. From the plans furnished by him was erected what may justly be termed the model theatre of the United States—elegance and comfort being combined, both for the auditor and actor. Of this I shall have to speak more at large.

The course of true love never did run smooth; and no actor ever attained the highest honours granted to his profession, that envy and malice did not attempt to wither "the bays" that encircle his brow.

After a career of success, which might truly be termed the Kemble mania, the divine Fanny was accused of having spoken disrespectfully of the Americans in their own capital, the city of Washington. Among other charges, the serious one of having said, the Americans did not know how to sit a horse correctly, and to maintain that the left, and not the right, should be the path the law ought to direct as the rule of the road. For this terrible crime of entertaining an opinion of her own, and daring to express it, she was to be doomed and called upon to give an account at the bar of public opinion assembled within the walls of the Walnut Street Theatre, where placards were distributed with the intention of proving, in this land of freedom, that a lady's tongue, from time immemorial her weapon of offence as well as defence, must be bridled, and not be permitted to wag in ridicule of any thing American.

CHAPTER XXV.

J. P. Wilkinson. Journey to the West. Beautiful scenery. Fine Situation of Pittsburgh. Dramatic Festival. Opening of the Pittsburgh [redacted] Tyrone Power.

Jones, Duffy, and Forrest, at the close of the season, were presented by the actors, and others, with a silver cup, valued at one hundred dollars, for the honourable manner in [redacted] they had discharged all their obligations, since they undertook the management of the Arch Street Theatre. The cup was presented by Morton M'Michael, Esq., in one of his happiest speeches, and received by Mr. Jones, the senior partner, with a [redacted] reply—nearly one hundred gentlemen being assembled on the stage, where an elegant cold collation was prepared; and [redacted] [redacted] anecdote enlivened [redacted] company, [redacted] dispersed about two o'clock, A. M., highly pleased [redacted] the events of the evening.

[redacted] 26th of March, [redacted] friend,

J. P. WILKINSON,

[redacted] his [redacted] [redacted] in Philadelphia [redacted] the Walnut [redacted] Theatre, [redacted] Ephraim, in the "School for Prejudice," and Geoffrey Mulmsep, in "Amateurs and Actors." O [redacted] ing, as he did, in London, with Arnold of the English opera house, a high station among his contemporaries, for many [redacted] and being known as the original representative of Dr. Logic, of universal [redacted], [redacted] would have been reasonable to suppose a full house would have assembled [redacted] the occasion. On the contrary, the [redacted] appearance of the audience [redacted] to damp the [redacted] of any actor. That [redacted] should have been so coldly received, and wholly neglected, was a slur on the dramatic taste of the city. The character of the Parish Charity Boy, so well understood in the British metropolis, and so totally unknown in the United States, the representation of [redacted] [redacted] Wilkinson the magnet of attraction for a [redacted] season, in a London theatre, produced not [redacted] slightest approbation. The feeling of the audience [redacted] [redacted] disappointment, which [redacted] have been mutual. If they thought the actor dull and prosing, he [redacted] have thought [redacted] cold and un [redacted] [redacted] dogged stupidity of [redacted] Charity Boy, kicked and [redacted] by every body in a London lodging-house, [redacted] not appreciated by [redacted] ever ready to laugh at the air [redacted] smartness of a Lissardo.

Wilkinson bore his disappointment like a philosopher, giving proof of [redacted] judgment and good sense, by fulfilling [redacted] his engagements, giving utterance to no complaints, and [redacted] [redacted] to [redacted] native country—to forget the folly which induced him [redacted] travel, [redacted] Murtoch Delany says, "to [redacted] foreign parts"—to enjoy [redacted] reputation at home, in the bosom of a happy family circle, of which he is not only the head, but the pride—an honourable and an [redacted] [redacted].

On the [redacted] of July, 1833, I [redacted] [redacted] Pittsburgh, accompanied by [redacted] wife, my two youngest children, and their nurse, wisely resolving not [redacted] abandon housekeeping in the city of Philadelphia, or to remove my family, until I saw whether the prospects of success, so brightly painted, would be realized.

A journey to the West, in 1833 was not [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] were not so numerous. The whole 500 miles was performed in stages, without a single stoppage throughout the route, which was advertised to be performed in four days and a half.

We started rather in melancholy mood—shaking [redacted] with one, nodding adieu to another, and kissing the [redacted] from the cheeks of the [redacted] about to be separated for [redacted] time from their parents—these thoughts occupied our minds for the first few miles. We had but two passengers, besides our own party, who left us at Lancaster, so that we were undisputed masters of the vehicle until we arrived at Carlisle, rendering the [redacted] night's journey very comfortable. At Chambersburgh, where [redacted] routes from Philadelphia [redacted] Baltimore joined, [redacted] received an addition [redacted] our numbers, by no [redacted] pleasant, six grown persons [redacted] three children, increasing [redacted] party. Thus, with every seat occupied, containing nine passengers, [redacted] [redacted] of five children, [redacted] remainder of the journey was [redacted] performed. [redacted] crowded, [redacted] commenced [redacted] of the mountains. Fortunately the weather [redacted] fair, [redacted] never [redacted] I forget [redacted] grandeur and beauty [redacted] the scene [redacted] met my eye, as I reached the summit of the Cove Mountain. [redacted] amphitheatre [redacted] forest, [redacted] all [redacted] rich [redacted] varied foliage, the farms in the valley beneath, the village at [redacted] of the mountain, [redacted] made us all forget every annoyance in exclamations of wonder and surprise—our fellow-travellers, like ourselves, crossing the mountains for the first time. [redacted] rapid descent, continuing for three miles, without interruption, alarmed the ladies, but delighted the children, and as [redacted] began [redacted] shadow the earth, at the close of the [redacted] day, the [redacted] [redacted] in torrents, continuing with slight intermission to the close of [redacted] journey, banishing [redacted] respect [redacted] comfort, [redacted] affording [redacted] opportunity of enjoying [redacted] mountain scenery [redacted] progressed.

When [redacted] arrived at Bedford, [redacted] were detained two hours, a most seasonable relief to the ladies. We should have supped here, but being heavily laden, and four hours behind our time, every body had retired to [redacted] but those whose duty [redacted] attend to the stage, on its arrival. A glass of milk-punch, and a cracker was all that could be obtained in the way of refreshment; [redacted] for that, I was too old a traveller to render a disagreeable situation more [redacted] by [redacted] exhibition of bad temper, where I knew there was no remedy but endurance. Mrs. Wemyss, too, although much fatigued, laughed at every thing with that happy disposition which enabled her to convert present annoyance into food for amusement to the party, and suffocated as we all were, she thought that in her life did she behold so beautiful a scene as the city, in passing through Mount Pleasant.

On the morning of the fifth day, we entered the city of Pittsburgh, seven o'clock, the rain descending and giving to the Birmingham of America a desolate and dreary appearance, speaking any thing but welcome.

We drove to the Exchange Hotel, where the hospitality we received at the hands of Mr. McQuire, soon restored us to good humour. My friend, Mr. George Cook, finished breakfast, and by 10 o'clock on the morning of the 10th of July, I found myself within the walls of the theatre to be the field of my future operations.

Carpenters, painters and gilders were busily employed upon what appeared to be a shell, which scarcely be ready by the first of September. The activity and energy of the contractors, Messrs. Roseburgh, Scott, Reynolds and McCallough accomplished all that in the given time, to the surprise as well as gratification of the citizens of Pittsburgh.

Pittsburgh, at this period, was at the height of prosperity, resembling a beehive, where no drone is suffered to exist. The roaring of the furnaces, the clank of the hammer, were incessantly heard, day and night, while the activity on the banks of the river, and of the canal, the constant train of drays laden with merchandise for the West, moving slowly along the streets, furnished a novel and pleasing sight—while the ringing of steamboat bells, and the roaring of the high pressure steam engines in the boats, as they arrived and departed, gave the best assurance of the prosperity of the city, and the business enterprise of its inhabitants.

No city in the United States is so romantically situated, or can boast of finer scenery in its immediate neighbourhood. The banks of the two rivers, the Monongahela and Allegheny, whose junction at this point form the Ohio River, the City of the Three Rivers, clouded as it is in endless smoke from its factories, possesses advantages not often met with in manufacturing towns. A walk of a quarter of a mile in any direction places you above the smoke, so much complained of by strangers, and presents to the view landscapes in which the eye of an artist revels with delight, and shady retreats upon its hills, where, free from observation, they can wander, and ponder upon the endless sources of wealth which the coal mines beneath their feet pour daily into this city of industry. And here it was I expected to take up my future residence.

Whoever is acquainted with the duties of a manager of a theatre, will know that during the last few weeks of building there is no time for the director to be idle. Six weeks had flown over my head, when by the arrival of a few members of my company, I was made aware that the time approached for the opening of the theatre rapidly approached. On Wednesday, 21st of August, I received an invitation from the directors of the theatre company, to meet them at the Shakespeare House, to the completion of their labours. I cannot give a better description of the evening, than I find in The Statesman of the 28th of August, headed:—

NEW THEATRE—DRAMATIC FESTIVAL.—On Wednesday evening, the directors of the Pittsburgh Theatre gave an excellent supper to Mr. Wetzy, and the contractors, to celebrate the completion of one of the handsomest buildings which the city of Pittsburgh ever boasted. At nine o'clock, about sixty gentlemen sat down to supper, at the Shakespeare House, provided in Mr. Wilson's best style. Harmony and good humour pervaded throughout; no one left the table but with a feeling of regret that the hours had passed so rapidly, on an occasion devoted to the feast of reason, and the flow of soul. The company retired at a late (early) hour, mutually pleased with each other's company. The following regular toasts were given from the chair, on the occasion:—

THE DRAMA.—Its agency in exerting a salutary influence is to be estimated not by the standard of possibilities, but by that which is incorporated with its design.

THE SHAKESPEARE.—The child of nature—he represents her as she often marries the chances of her colouring, in the simplicity of her imagery.

THE CONTRACTORS OF THE NEW THEATRE.—The skill and promptitude which completed it, are in good keeping with the taste which furnished the model.

THE WILSON DRAMA.—May it reflect the wealth of European painting, united with the classic taste, upon the exportation of arts and the workshops of industry.

MR. WETZY, THE PRESIDENT MANAGER OF THE PITTSBURGH THEATRE.—With pleasure we greet his presence, and trust that his urbanity and anxiety to please, will meet the success due to his talents and professional skill.

After the applause with which this toast was received had subsided, Mr. Wetzy rose, and in a neat speech, of which we can only give the substance, returned thanks as follows:—

GENTLEMEN.—In rising to acknowledge the favour you have just conferred upon me, perhaps the best method of returning my thanks, is to assure those gentlemen, many of whom I see around me, (to whose undaunted perseverance the good cause owes the erection of a theatre, which I may boldly affirm, in point of elegance of structure, decoration, convenience, and comfort, both to auditor and actor, is not surpassed by any in the United States;) that so long as it remains under my direction, no exhibition shall ever take place within its walls, calculated to cause a feeling of regret to any individual who may have contributed a single dollar towards its erection.

Gentlemen, as far as one man's efforts can be directed to the improvement of the theatre, mine will be directed to that end.

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

Overtures will be made to every actor of superior talent, who may be at present, or shall hereafter arrive, in the United States; and I doubt not that many, if not all, will be induced to visit your busy and prosperous city.

For the kind manner in which you have been pleased to receive the toast of our worthy President, relating to my humble self, I can hardly thank you as I ought. I will not longer trespass on your time, but will, with your permission, propose the health of the 'President and Directors of the Pittsburgh Theatre.' With all the honours, drank with three times three, and one cheer more.

The following volunteer toasts were given on the occasion.

Education—The only moral steers that will work without friction; the engine of the world.

THE LAMBS OF PITTSBURGH—Where they take the lead, who will fear to follow.

MR. J. R. Smith, the Scenic Artist of the Pittsburgh Theatre—In this instance he has demonstrated by the touches of his skill, that the warmth and aspirations of the youthful imagination can be transferred to canvas. In the language of Shylock to Portia, "How much older art thou than thy looks?"

THE THEATRE—The elegance of the structure and the rapidity of its completion, proves that Pittsburgh, in point of taste, skill, and enterprise, is not surpassed by any city in the Union.

MARCH OF REFINEMENT AND LIBERALITY—We hail these lovely harbingers of a "New Era," even amid clouds of smoke and the fumes of intolerance.

THE PARSN—As connected with the drama, the devil is said to be both, but is harmless so long as he is bound by beads.

THE OCCASION OF OUR MEETING—May we all continue to be stockholders in fellowship and good feeling, and ever ready to pay our instalments our share of the good things around us.

THE PROGRESS OF THE DRAMA—The strongest evidence of a refined civilisation in every age coincident with the progress of the drama.

THE HISTORY OF CARICATURE—When prompted by spleen, though very slightly wound, the mimic generally rebounds upon the hyper-critic; but when guided by science, taste and impartiality, is a salutary force in meliorating literary society.

PITTSBURGH—Her moral force, without classic walls united with practical exhibitions of it, would be deficient in an important fellow-laver.

The theatre being finished, was opened on Monday, the 2nd of September, with an address, written by N. R. Smith, Esq., of Pittsburgh and spoken by myself.

ADDRESS.

When Genius, hovering in his native sky,
O'er climes untutored cast a watchful eye,
As yet, while thought was cradled by the Nile,
And sanctified by nymphs from Olympus' shrine,

He sunk at length from his empyreal height,
 And shed o'er Greece the rays of classic light.
 The Muses triumphed and the Graces smiled,
 As brightened forth the dawning of their child;
 The plastic power of Genius interwove
 Strength, fervour, beauty, in the infant mind;
 And reason, memory, judgment, formed the skill
 To rule the passions, and control the will.
 Still as the Thought grew up, he knew
 No art to bring man's foibles into view,
 Nor yet their virtues, that this plan
 Might meliorate, exalt immortal man.
 To give perfection to the skill their muse,
 Thalia and Melpomene
 Greece rose in splendour as the lambent flame
 Genius kindled, blazoned forth her fame;
 Arts, science, arms, possessed the aspiring soul,
 And the bright Drama crowned the boundless whole.
 The Nine survived the ravages of time,
 And trophies in another clime.
 Rome caught the Grecian spirit, and her pride
 Conceived new honours, spread her laurels wide,
 And triumphed long the mistress of the sphere,
 Till ruthless ruin checked her high career.
 The torch of Genius, though its flame had waned, Extinguished, for the spark remained;
 And rescued from the Muses' bow,
 Returned at length with renovated power.
 To Gothic night succeeded all the fame,
 And morn'g that gave to Greece and Rome a classic name:
 The crest of Europe rose as Science spread,
 And o'er the world its light and lustre shed;
 Shakspeare appeared the Drama's claim to try,
 Gave it new worth, and fixed its destiny.
 Length, Freedom planted here the Tree,
 And our soil the Home of Liberty,
 Beneath its shade she fixed the Drama's seat,
 Where all the powers of Nature meet.
 Hail to Columbia, free and unoppressed,
 And hail the rising glory of the West!
 Queen of the West, we trace thy rapid rise
 From forest gloom beneath inclement skies.
 Prophetic vision to this age—
 He—an enthusiast—madman—to presage,
 That thirty years would throng a bleak, wide waste
 With wealth and pride, with fashion, beauty, taste.
 Taste and refinement here have joined to rear—
 Adorn a Dome, that pleads your guardian care,
 Taste shall unfold what taste alone imparts,
 Enlightened and generous hearts:
 And here the Drama shall display confessed,
 The Nine still vigorous, the Muses blest.

The play was the "Busy Body," and the afterpiece, "Of To-morrow." The company consisted of Mr. Addams, John Sefton, Mr. Charles Green, Mr. Henry Eberle, Mr. George Smith, Mr. William Smith, Mr. D. Rice, Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Bannister, Mr. Spencer, Mr. Wallace, M'Dougal, Mr. W. Sefton, Gifford, Mr. Parsloe, Hathwell, Mr. Warren, and Mr. Wemyss; Mrs. J. Sefton, Mrs. Green, Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Turner, Miss Julia Turner, Miss Turner, Mrs. H. Eberle, Mrs. M'Dougal, Mrs. Hubbard, and Miss Hathwell. There were also engaged, who made their appearance in fulfillment of contract, M'Bride, Mr. and Mrs. Stickney, Milliken, Mr. Miller, and Mr. Cuddy.

I had made my arrangements upon a scale much too large for the population. The number of seats would have been sufficient. It is therefore, not surprising, that the first season was by no means productive; and my Pittsburgh friends, (who are numerous,) will excuse me for the declaration, that their judgment in theatrical matters is most singular. They bear comparison with the best in the Atlantic cities; yet they were the worst actors, (with exception of Mr. A. Addams,) as their especial favourites, even poor Spencer, (who afterwards perished with Fanning, a hero, in Texas,) from the stage, because he was like a gentleman, and would persist in wearing kid gloves in the street. Another amiable trait in their character, was a practice they had of hazing the manager on the last night of the season, merely in wanton sport, always saving his feelings with a good house. Booth they pronounced a bad actor; E. they did not support during his first visit; and yet years afterwards they crowded the theatre nightly in performance of both gentlemen; although the former disgraced himself as usual, by appearing in "Hamlet" in a state of intoxication. Yet this theatre, when I became acquainted with some of the citizens, and experience taught me how to manage it, proved the best and most profitable, ever under my control.

The receipts of the first night amounted to 323 dollars 66 cents, which fell to 191 dollars, on the second. The first night was 394 dollars 25 cents; yet he was the member of the company, who played under one dollar, ("King Lear," the character,) while Mr. Booth's first night was 112 dollars; yet he played Hamlet to 112 dollars, and Pescara to 106 dollars. Mr. Power's first night was 353 dollars, his second, 119 dollars 25 cents. In fact, the worthy citizens of Pittsburgh seemed to think their duty performed towards the manager, if they received a star of the brightest nature with one good house, and made him a great benefit, the system—one for you, the other for him.

The following letter of Booth's deserves a place from its singularity. It bears the Baltimore post mark of the 3rd December.

(CONT.)

"TUESDAY NIGHT,

"Stage Office, once more.

"I am, as the French say, en route, and hope to reach Pittsburgh in time to begin on Monday night—bar sickness, my lord judge, and other delays.

"My Managers of the West, you are partly the cause of ———. Had you not known Mr. Booth as being engaged in Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, Hamblin never would have caught me here as he did. It is best, in my humble opinion, not to announce until the boat arrives.

"Yours as in duty bound,

(Signed) "J. B."

"Good!—commence with I am—conclude with J. B.—he conjugates—the villain!

"To ———, Esq.

"Theatre, Pittsburgh, ———

During ——— time the theatre ——— building, the stockholders were ——— nothing ——— left undone ——— render ——— perfect as possible. And entering into this feeling, I ——— solved the arrangements ——— the interior should be made worthy of imitation by larger establishments. Every dressing ——— carpeted and ———. The ——— room furnished in the style of a modern drawing room, with piano, ottomans, chairs, looking-glasses, &c. ——— whole costing upwards of ——— thousand dollars.

During the ——— season, from the 2nd of September, until ——— January, upwards of four months, ——— receipts ——— thousand six ——— twenty-seven dollars ——— thirty-seven cents; ——— which is to be added, one ——— dollars for season tickets; ——— in all, 10,327 dollars. Out of which the stars received $291 dollars, ——— the actors from their benefits, ———.

Notwithstanding ——— or ——— unpleasant occurrences, I was enabled at the close of the season, to state, that during ——— hundred and eleven nights, not a single change ——— taken place in the pieces announced to be performed, which for variety, could challenge competition.

On the 10th of January, 1834, I took the company down the river for ——— weeks, to Wheeling, where ——— acted to an average of seventy-five dollars a night, in a large ——— mis-called a theatre. ——— Smith painted some very pretty scenery, and I escaped with a loss of three hundred dollars, ——— keep the company together, until my return to Pittsburgh on the 23rd of February, for the purpose of presenting to the citizens the inimitable

TYRONE POWER.

Who that ever saw his laughing face, but must regret his lamentable end, as one of the "ill starred" passengers of the lost steamship President—the ocean for a grain. When I first saw Power act, he was considered a light comedian of mediocre talent, possessing so much quicksilver, that it was impossible to keep him quiet in any one spot of the stage for two consecutive seconds. This failing he never entirely overcame himself of; it was conspicuous in the "Irish Ambassador," in Hatter, in "How to Play the Rent;" and in Pat Rooney,—annoying every one who had to support a character in the place; but not displeasing to the audience.

Chance installed him as the Irish comedian when poor Connor died suddenly. His success at first, was by means extraordinary; it was tolerated as a good natured effort of an actor, and the management in a dilemma. He rose in public favour slowly, and not until his return from the first visit to the United States in 1833, did he become an actor of consideration in London, where, prior to his death, fame and fortune were struggling who should win him fastest. He was a noble, generous-hearted fellow, always willing to do a charitable action without making a parade of it, to theatrical capital upon.

His career in America was beyond comparison, seldom playing to a bad house; frequently crowding the theatre to full capacity. An universal favourite with actors, managers, and the public; good humoured Paddy Power, cognomen behind his scenes as well as before the curtain. His last appearance but one, in Pittsburgh, was marked by one of those disgraceful accidents which render theatres, and all connected with them, a bye-word for the singer of scorn. In the play the "Irish Ambassador," Mr. Green and Mr. Hubbard were so intoxicated, as to render it necessary to remove the first named from the theatre; and the latter actually fell upon the stage during his performance. Mr. John Sefton took the part of one delinquent, while I had to do the same in a similar manner for the other.

Power bore the mortification with remarkable good nature; having been in a great measure to blame, for dismissing the rehearsal at 12 o'clock with one of those complimentary speeches yclept "blarney," which he knew so well how to use on all proper occasions. Whether he felt what he so neatly expressed, or wished himself to take the ride for amusement he recommended to the actors, is a matter of no importance. In following his advice, Mr. W. Sefton, Mr. A. Addams, C. Green, and Hubbard returned to the city, as Bob Logic would say, ■ prime order—the consequence of which has ■

 ■■■■■■■■■■.

■■■ ■■■■ was ■■■■ ■■■■ ladies, which I need scarcely add, did not ■■■■ again during the ■■■■. It was ■ death-blow ■■■■ reputation, and ■■■■ every similar exhibition should be, by every respectable citizen absenting himself from the theatre; although, as the manager, I was the innocent sufferer. I bowed with respect to the decision which I felt to ■■■■ just, ■■■■ recommended the ■■■■ adopted by the Pittsburgh audience, as worthy of imitation; it is the only one to prevent a repetition of insult. ■■■■ have been ■■■■ one step farther, by a marked ■■■■ never ■■■■ permit the ■■■■ again to ■■■■ upon the stage of ■■■■ Pittsburgh Theatre.

I had used every endeavour to induce P'ower ■■■■ visit ■■■■ burch, ■■■■ him into compliance, and ■■■■ sorry ■■■■ part with him on such terms, just as the audience were beginning to appreciate ■■■■ merit. ■■■■ agreed to play ■■■■ night ■■■■ to prove ■■■■ the public that ■■■■ acquitted me of all blame, ■■■■ rather accused himself as ■■■■ author of the evil which thus brought his engagement to a premature close. He alludes ■■■■ jocosely ■■■■ his Recollections of America. Poor fellow, ■■■■ fame is ■■■■ in the ■■■■ as ■■■■ as the ■■■■ world, ■■■■ many a ■■■■ sigh has been breathed ■■■■ memory of—Poor P'ower.

■■■■ commenced his engagement ■■■■ the ■■■■ of March, with ■■■■ Patrick O'Plenipo, in ■■■■ "Irish Ambassador," and finished with Paddy O'Hafferty, ■■■■ "Born ■■■■ Luck." ■■■■ delighted with the theatre, and ■■■■ honourable mention of it in ■■■■ account of Pittsburgh.

I subjoin ■■■■ letter, upon ■■■■ subject of ■■■■ engagement:—

(COPY.)

"MR ■■■■ ■■■■ WASHINGTON—

"I perceive that you purpose re-opening the Pittsburgh Theatre, in February. Now, I shall be here in April, and if, about the end of that month, or ■■■■ May, you think a visit from ■■■■ to my countrymen there will ■■■■ our mutual end, I shall be most happy to meet you on the banks of the Ohio. I congratulate you on the terms you appear to part with your constituents—and in the way of news from England, have only ■■■■ tell you Dunn & Co. are gone to the devil. Never ■■■■ in quackery ■■■■ absolute than the attempt to "gag" the profession, by ■■■■ two theatres in ■■■■ ■■■■ me to beg an early reply. I act here until the 7th ■■■■ February, and on the 17th open in Boston. With best wishes, believe me,

"Truly Yours,

(Signed,) ■■■■ TRINITY POWELL.

■ ■■■■ House, ■■■■ Adelphi,
 January 25, 1851."

Who that ever saw his laughing face, but must regret his lamentable end, as one of the "ill starred" passengers of the lost steamship President—the ocean for a grain. When I first saw Power act, he was considered a light comedian of mediocre talent, possessing so much quicksilver, that it was impossible to keep him quiet in any one spot of the stage for two consecutive seconds. This falling he never entirely divested himself of; it was conspicuous in the "Irish Ambassador," in Ratler, in "How to Pay the Rent;" or in Pat Rooney,—annoying to every actor who had to support a character in the piece; but unpleasant to the audience.

Chance installed him as the Irish comedian when Paddy Connor died so suddenly. His success at first, was by no means extraordinary; it was tolerated as a good natured effort on the actor's part, and the management in a dilemma. It was in public favour slowly, and it was not until his return from the United States in 1833, that he became a consideration in London, where, prior to his death, his fortune was struggling who should crown him. He was a noble, generous-hearted fellow, always willing to do a charitable action without making a parade of it, or squandering theatrical capital upon.

His career in America was brilliant beyond comparison, seldom playing to a bad house; frequently crowding the theatre to excess. An universal favourite with actors, managers, and the public; good humoured Paddy Power, his cognomen behind his scenes as well as before the curtain. His last appearance was one, in Edinburgh, when he was by one of those disgraceful accidents which render theatres, neglected, a bye-word for the finger of scorn. In the play of the "Irish Ambassador," Mr. Green and Mr. Hubbard were so intoxicated, as to render it necessary that the first named from the theatre; and the latter actually fell upon the stage during his performance. Mr. John Sefton read the part of one delinquent, while I had to do in a similar manner for the other.

Power bore the mortification with remarkable good nature; having been in a great measure to blame, for dismissing the rehearsal at 12 o'clock with one of those complimentary speeches yclept "blarney," which he knew so well how to use on all proper occasions. Whether he felt what he so neatly expressed, or wished himself to take the ride for amusement he recommended to the actors, is a matter of no importance. In following his advice, Mr. W. Sefton, Mr. A. Addams, C. Green, and Hubbard returned to the city, as Bob Logic would say, in prime order—the consequence of which has been [REDACTED].

The theatre was filled with ladies, which I need scarcely add, did not occur again during the season. It was a death-blow to our reputation, and resented as every similar exhibition should be, by every respectable citizen absenting [REDACTED] from the theatre; although, as the manager, I was the [REDACTED] cent sufferer. I bowed with respect to the decision which I felt to be just, and recommended the course adopted by [REDACTED] Pittsburgh audience, as worthy of imitation; [REDACTED] is the only one to prevent a repetition of insult. It should have been carried one step further, by a marked determination never to permit [REDACTED] offenders again to appear upon the stage of the Pittsburgh Theatre.

I had used every endeavour to induce Power to visit Pittsburgh, had teased him into compliance, and was sorry to part with him on such terms, just as the audience were beginning to appreciate [REDACTED] merit. He agreed to play one night more, to prove to the public that he acquitted me of all blame, and rather accused himself as the author of the evil which thus brought his engagement to a premature close. He alluded to it jocosely in his Recollections of America. Poor fellow, his fame is [REDACTED] in the [REDACTED] as [REDACTED] as [REDACTED] world, [REDACTED] many a [REDACTED] sigh has been breathed to the memory of—Poor Power.

He commenced his engagement on the 31st of March, with Sir Patrick O'Plenipo, in [REDACTED] "Irish Ambassador," and finished with Paddy O'Rafferty, in "Born to Good Luck." He was delighted with the theatre, and makes honourable mention of it in his account of Pittsburgh.

I subjoin [REDACTED] letter, upon the subject of his engagement:—

(COPY.)

"Mr [REDACTED] Mr. WEAVER:—

"I perceive that you purpose re-opening the Pittsburgh Theatre, in February. Now, I shall be here in April, and if, about the end of that month, or in May, you think a visit from me to my countrymen there will answer our mutual end, I shall be most happy to meet you on the banks of the Ohio. I congratulate you on the terms you appear to part with your constituents—and in the way of news from England, have only [REDACTED] tell you Bunn & Co. are gone to the devil. Never was [REDACTED] quackery more absolute than this attempt to "gag" the profession, by joining [REDACTED] theatre. [REDACTED] Allow me to beg an early reply. I act here [REDACTED] the 7th of February, and on the 17th open in Boston. With best wishes, believe me,

"Truly Yours,

(Signed,) "TYMOTHY POWER."

"MANSION HOUSE, Philadelphia, January 25, 1854."

CHAPTER XXVI.

Removal to Pittsburgh. Visit from the Author's Brother. Lake Erie. The Falls of Niagara. Bad Roads. The Ohio River. Cincinnati. Commencement of the Fall Season at Pittsburgh. Strange Changes. Lease of the Walnut Street Theatre. Burton, as an Actor and Author. Mr. and Mrs. Wood. Miss Phelps. James Sheridan Knowles.

FINDING the theatre with careful management could afford a comfortable livelihood, I lost no time in sending for my family from Philadelphia. I hired a house in Liberty Street, and made up my mind to a long residence in the city of Pittsburgh. How little do we know of our future destiny, which, in despite of our daily labour, urges us on to the fulfilment allotted by fate to every member of the human family.

We soon had the pleasure of beholding our children seated once more at the table, from which they had been daily missed, and again under the eye of their ever anxious and affectionate mother.

. During the summer, I had the addition of a fine little Pittsburgh boy to my family, and a visit from my brother, Captain Wemyss, of the British army, whom I had not seen for twenty years. We parted as boys, and met—he, a veteran officer, and I—but no matter. If my position in society was altered, my pocket had been replenished by my long course of buffoonery.

In his company, I travelled through the State of Ohio, finally taking a steamboat on Lake Erie, in which we descended to Buffalo, and so crossing into Canada at Black Rock, proceeded to the wonder of the world, the Falls of Niagara, which every Englishman, travelling for pleasure, takes the earliest opportunity of visiting. If I attempt no description of them, it is because they cannot be described. I was fool enough to venture under the mighty cataract, which feat of daring is daily practised; and only those who have stood upon the rocks, and seen the mighty flood, which in an instant might overwhelm them, can form any idea of the various feelings which in so short a space of time crowd into the human mind. How insignificant does man appear when thus braving his Creator—placing his life in jeopardy—for what? to say, "I have been under the Falls of Niagara." What romantic folly!

From Fort George, we crossed Lake Ontario to Toronto, where Captain Wemyss met some of his old military companions, in whose society we spent a delightful evening. The following morning we retraced our steps, returning towards Pittsburgh through the country of the Seneca Indians, paying for our ride, but dragging the coach two miles for one it dragged us. Never did I see such roads; every five minutes we heard the driver's summons to dismount, for we were stalled again; so with the assistance of a rail, we contrived to extricate the lumbering vehicle, in which we had engaged a passage to the town of Erie. We returned by this route, preferring the conveyance, during a high gale of wind, and as we progressed along the margin of that sheet of water we beheld so placid a few days previously, we beheld it lashed into fury by the wind, exhibiting one vast crest of turbulent foam on inland sea.

A delightful trip, we arrived at Pittsburgh, whence we proceeded a few weeks to Wheeling. On my return, Captain Wemyss took his departure for the West Indies, and left, for a time, a void in our family circle, which he had enlivened during the summer.

My wife and I, Pittsburgh stranger accompanied me a visit of business to Louisville, Kentucky. In down the Ohio, we enjoyed the beautiful scenery of that splendid river. At Cincinnati, where we remained one night, I of course paid a visit to the theatre, then under the management of [redacted] and Rowe, of New Orleans. The proud Queen of the West Philadelphia in miniature; the regular building, the appearance, and the industrious population. Citizens who founded this place may well feel proud of their handi-work. Louisville, though a more active place of business, far behind Cincinnati in what may be termed the picturesque and beautiful. We remained there one week, and ascending the Ohio, returned to Pittsburgh to make preparations for the fall theatre, which commenced on the 8th of September. The cast, Mr. John Sefton, Sefton, Oxley, Porter, J. G. Porter, Schinotti, Kent, Lewellen, Cordova, J. Reed, C. Green, Harris, and Wells, Mrs. C. Green, Kent, Roper, Mrs. Lewellen, Combs, Mrs. J. Sefton; new faces, and many of them actors of talent. At the commencement of the season an effort was made by a committee of those who took an interest in the welfare of the theatre, to secure the performance of one legitimate five-act comedy in each week, the play to be chosen by the committee, who affirmed that this species of dramatic representation was most congenial to the taste of the citizens of Pittsburgh. The night selected was the Wednesday in each week. The first play, the "School for Scandal," a judicious selection, which filled the lower boxes, but the pit, gallery, and upper boxes were empty. The second comedy, "She stoops to Conquer," was followed by the like result, whereas the repetition of the "School for Scandal," as the third attempt, failed to procure even the attendance of the committee themselves, who gave me any further attempt in despair, leaving me for my future management of the theatre in my own way, with the promise of their future support in any effort which should not be considered as degrading to a temple dedicated to the muses.

The failure of this attempt to make one decent house each week, induced me to turn my thoughts to other cities for permanent support, convinced, thereby, that Pittsburgh could not be relied upon for a longer season than six weeks or two months at any one time.

My departure from Philadelphia, strange changes had taken place. Duffy and Forrest had abandoned the Arch Street Theatre, the Maywood Co. had taken, leaving the Walnut Theatre without a tenant, which being proposed to let, I was deliberating whether to return to the East, or to my friends further West, Cincinnati and Louisville, where the theatres leased by Russell Rowe, were offered to me for the winter season, when my friend George Cook, unexpectedly made my appearance at my house, and during dinner, on the Sabbath day, issued his orders for my immediate departure for Philadelphia, thus:—"Frank," said he, "I have been thinking over your affairs, I am afraid Western theatres won't answer your purpose, you must go to the mountains this evening, and at once secure the Walnut Theatre; this city, it is evident, will not by itself support a company of actors, and as I brought you here, I feel in duty bound to have you placed in as good a position as I found you, when you adopted my advice—try your fortune in this city of iron smoke."

In eight hours I found myself comfortably in the Pittsburgh coach, "en route" to Philadelphia, the proprietors of the Walnut Street Theatre in this city suddenly are resolutions taken, which were in my life.

When I arrived in this city of brotherly love, the first person I surprised by my unexpected appearance, was my worthy friend Louis A. Godey, who had become a "Benedict" since we parted. I communicated to him the object of my visit. He seemed to think very highly of my speculation, and even dissuaded me from making an offer; but a letter from Pittsburgh, with orders all but peremptory, decided the matter.

In forty-eight hours after my arrival, all the preliminaries were agreed to. Rent four thousand one hundred and fifty dollars per year, exclusive of the rooms occupied as bars, which, on account of a recent law, prohibiting the granting of tavern licence to theatres, I refused to have anything to do with, the stockholders received three thousand dollars per year, for breaking a law which the manager thought proper to obey. More of this hereafter.

I agreed to pay one thousand dollars in advance upon signing the lease, and the stockholders agreed to re-decorate and paint the theatre according to a plan furnished by myself. I left them to prepare the lease for signature, while I proceeded to New York to complete my arrangements. I remained some days, where Thomas Flynn, one of Mr. Hamblin, promised things which his proprietorwards were to ratify.

I returned to Pittsburgh on the twelfth day after my departure, with the lease in my pocket, to prepare for opening what was christened the American Theatre in Philadelphia.

I was in Philadelphia, I visited the Arch Theatre, where Power was performing as usual, to good houses, I learnt that Mr. Maywood hourly expected recruits from England, the stock These were Hamilton, Mr. Lindsay, Mr. Brunton, Mr. Pelham, Elphinstone, and Mr. E. Burton. The last, the only one destined to add to the talent of the American stage; although, on his arrival in Philadelphia, he did not receive a very warm reception. No sooner did he played Guy Goodluck in "John Jones," than the Philadelphians discovered they had acquired an actor worthy of Jefferson; and he rapidly rose in estimation, assuming in no long period, the proud title of a star; rather an unusual honour to a stock actor on the American stage. With him originated the Graham's Magazine, which he sold to Graham, the present proprietor, in turn manager; an unfortunate exchange in a pecuniary point of view. However, his pride may have been flattered in converting the old Circus in Chestnut Street, into the splendid United States Theatre, where in a short period he was pre-eminently successful; but daily under his effort to sustain a theatre, where those already established rapidly changing hands for support. Mr. Burton as an author, manager, actor, or author, is indefatigable. His industry deserves that success which the writer sincerely wishes may ultimately crown all his efforts. As an actor, he is entitled to the first rank in his profession; however public opinion may vary upon some points, all will just, when pronounced the best low of the American stage.

My first business after my arrival at Pittsburgh, was to despatch my artist, W. Burrell Smith, (a name since well known as the Annals of America) to Philadelphia, to decorate the interior of the Academy. And Wood did he execute that work. The design was formed thus: each tier of boxes was decorated with paintings representing some celebrated person in the history of the United States; around the drum circle were placed busts of the heads of the Presidents; around the second tier, the heads of celebrated generals, and around the third tier, the heads of the naval heroes; between each bust and its corresponding painting, was a large brilliant gold star, the whole forming on a pink ground, the most pleasing interior I ever saw. I have seen more gaudy, but never one so chaste.

The time for opening was fixed for the 22d of December, 1834, the Monday previous to Christmas Day, giving me ample time to bring my season to a successful termination in Pittsburgh, and to make the necessary arrangements for returning to the city of Philadelphia after an absence of eighteen months, during which Duffy Forrest commenced the campaign of 1834 and 1835, at the Arch Street Theatre. On the 15th of August 1835, with the "Iron Chest" and the "Young Widow," J. R. Scott playing Sir Edward Mortimer. The stars announced, being E. Forrest, Master Burke, and Mrs. Conduitt, who afterwards became notorious as the cause of Mr. and Mrs. Wood's fracas in New York, and this may be an appropriate place for the following remarks.

MR. AND MRS. WOOD.

These distinguished vocalists made their first appearance in the United States, at the Park Theatre, New York, on the 19th of September, 1833, as the Prince and Cinderella; and at the Chestnut Street Theatre, as above related; here their first engagement was not a profitable one. It was not until the following season when they produced "Le Somnambule," that the nightly crowded and delighted audience. The lady, as Fulton, long enjoyed the reputation of being the best English singer of the day. Wood served that title, let those decide who have heard her "Norma." As to her merit, there is no divided opinion; but as to the merit of Mr. Wood, there are as many opinions as critics; no two agreeing upon the exact rank he ought to hold as a vocalist.

To the Woods belongs the credit of establishing what Mrs. Austin and Mr. Berkeley commenced—a taste for English Opera, on so firm a basis, as to render it essential to the success of a theatrical season. They made the citizens of these United States in love with music, paving the way for the success of Mr. and Mrs. Seguin, Miss Sheriff, Mr. Wilson, Giddelei, Miss Poole, &c. The only thing now wanting to place the American theatres in the same rank as the best in Europe is "The Ballet," for which Fanny Ellsler has left a hankering wish, as Malibran did for the Italian Opera.

No person has been treated so harshly by the American public as Mr. Wood; twice driven in disgrace from the stage, and on both occasions without cause, or even reasonable complaint, on the part of his persecutors.

Mr. E. Forrest refused to act for the benefit of the poor, in his native city of Philadelphia, during a winter of more than common severity; but nobody dreamt of hissing him ~~from~~ stage, or forcing ~~him~~ to retire from his profession, ~~and~~ ~~the~~ right of any committee to dispose of his services as they thought proper, or to ~~take~~ from him two hundred dollars, (the compensation he received for acting nightly,) for the same purpose to which they generously proposed to contribute the price of a box-ticket. As a ~~business~~ professional services, which nobody presumes to say ~~he~~ had not a right to do; but ~~he~~ offered publicly, through ~~the~~ newspapers, to ~~accept~~ any sum ~~either~~ gentlemen who were clamorous on the subject of ~~his~~ refusal would give for the relief of the poor, from one hundred to five hundred dollars; but they declined this just ~~offer~~ of testing ~~the~~ sincerity of their charity, designating the proposal as an insult from a purse-proud actor. ~~His~~ obloquy has ~~been~~ upon ~~Mr.~~ Forrest's name for ~~his~~ want of feeling he ~~insisted~~ in refusing his professional aid for this benefit; but I can see no evidence of want of feeling in the proposition ~~and~~ accompanied ~~his~~ refusal. It was a determination to maintain the right of control over ~~his~~ business capital (i. e., talent,) at the same time that he was willing to contribute generously ~~to~~ of the poor.

~~The~~ made upon ~~Mr.~~ Wood was of a similar nature, ~~and~~ exercise of the same control ~~was~~ refused. ~~He~~ was in ~~fact~~ as charity ~~was~~ individual, a member of the profession, ~~and~~ had not ~~the~~ slightest claim upon ~~her~~ consideration ~~and~~ she should respect, and her friends demand, the gratuitous services of Mr. and Mrs. Wood on her benefit night. Was Mrs. Conduit the friend or associate of ~~Mr.~~ Wood? Assuredly not. They ~~performed~~ nothing in ~~but~~ unenviable title of actress. The attack made upon Mr. Wood was followed up with ~~the~~ ferocity of savages, and disgraceful to a ~~civilized~~ community. ~~He~~ was, perhaps, ~~unduly~~ easily ~~and~~ turned the tide of popular indignation ~~and~~ admiration, by at once acceding, in bland terms, to the wishes of ~~the~~ for the avowed purpose of insulting him, and offering the services of himself and Mrs. Wood for the lady's benefit; but he preferred his independence ■■■ interest, refusing to yield to threats what ■■■ had already declined ■■■ entreaty. His ■■■ duct, in spitting in the face of the reporter of the Courier and Enquirer—the newspaper which produced ■■■ mischief—■■■ an excuse; but it was a manly feeling which prompted ■■■ He was too young ■■■ powerful ■■■ attack ■■■ old ■■■ for ■■■ purpose of "castigation, without a charge ■■■ cowardice; ■■■ have challenged him would only have ■■■ subjected himself to a column of abuse in ■■■ ■■■ audacity of ■■■ actor, whose profession ■■■ have been said, excludes ■■■ from ■■■ gentleman, daring to ■■■ the redress of one. ■■■ did it, therefore, to provoke from ■■■ reporter a demand of that satisfaction for an insult no gentleman could brook, which he was anxious and willing ■■■ afford him. But these ■■■ reputation always shrink from the responsibility of personal encounter; in a court of law, and not the court of honour, he sought his redress, receiving several thousand dollars for preventing Mr. Wood from peacefully pursuing his profession. Hard sentence this, for ■■■ assault unattended by violence. Had the reporter spat upon the actor, the judge, I ■■■ inclined to think, would have pronounced ■■■ such heavy penalty. The ■■■ of New York fined Bennett of the Herald five ■■■ dollars ■■■ libelling a judge, and Wood, the actor, thousands, for spitting in the face of "one of ■■■ gentlemen of the press," who had not only ■■■ him, but through the influence of ■■■ newspaper ■■■ which he wrote, fomented a conspiracy which drove him from the stage.

The ■■■ second thoughts of the people convincing them that Wood had been most hardly dealt with, ■■■ wishing once more to hear the siren notes of Mrs. Wood, he was invited to ■■■ Atlantic, with ■■■ assurance that ■■■ part was buried for ever in oblivion. In an evil hour he consented again to visit the United States, to be again insulted, without having given any cause of offence; but Philadelphia, ■■■ New York, was the scene of his last degradation.

The Opera ■■■ "Norma" had been produced at the Broadway Street Theatre, as opera alone can be rendered effective, with a full ■■■ of instrumental music, and a full chorus of well-drilled singers; but the result proved that the managers did not reap a full harvest. The receipts were unequal to the expenditure; they could not pay their singers and musicians; and because Mr. Wood would not consent to do it for them, by sacrificing his share of the proceeds to the necessity of the theatre, he was, a second time, compelled to resign his professional engagements; the only offence laid to his charge being a refusal to proceed with the opera without being paid for his services, according to contract. When the managers and himself agreed to bring what they represented to be a losing engagement to the theatre, as a termination, was made by either party to the fact of the following night being the one appropriated to the benefit of Mrs. Bailey. Mrs. Wood volunteered her services for a concert, to be given by Mrs. Bailey, at which Mr. Wood was not permitted to sing; he prudently declining to appear when rumour pointed out "a row," without an object. Thus the Woods were, a second time, driven from the shores of America, victims of unjust persecution. Kean, who had offended, was severely, but perhaps justly, punished; Anderson his fate, and courted it; but Wood was the victim of per violence and misrepresentation, and, to crown all, invested the greater part of his professional earnings in the United Bank—all lost; so that his recollections of the United Bank must be very agreeable; and if the notes of the bank and his wife were considered as of little or no value, those he received in proved more worthless.

of Mr. William caused the Arch Street Theatre to for the early in the 4th of February. On the 11th of June, Mr. Duffy produced Dr. Bird's play of the "Broker of Bogota," written for Mr. E. Forrest. Why it has been so seldom acted, might well be asked; for as an effective acting play it is superior to either the "Gladiator" or "Oraloca," from the pen of the same author.

On the 23rd of August, 1834, Maywood and Co. commenced their in the Arch Theatre, with the play of "Man and Wife," and "Simpson and Co." Maywood having England during the vacation, as recruits, Mr. Burton, Mr. Hamilton, Pelham, Miss Elphinstone, who made appearance in the United thus: on the of August, Mr. Hamilton as Sir. Backbite, Pelham as Tally Teasle, in the "School for"; on the 26th, Miss Elphinstone as Juliet; and on the September, Burton, as Dr. Ollapod, in the "Poor Gentleman," and Wormwood in the "Merry Tattle Power and Wallack played each for a few nights; and on the 11th of October, the Chaut opened "Romeo and Juliet."

acting the part of Juliet. This young lady's fame in the theatrical world was of very recent date, and, although supported by Wallack, always a favourite with the Philadelphia public, her engagement was not an attractive one. The managers had raised the prices—to one dollar, boxes, and fifty cents to the pit, which, might have caused the failure, more than any want of talent in Miss Philips, who is universally respected for her private worth; and having retired from the stage, is scarcely a fair (yet she is a very fair) subject for criticism.

announced were Matthews, J. Wallack, Sheridan Knowles, Mr. Toman, Signor Laura pupils, Miss Philips, Miss Fanny Jarman, and Hazz Cline.

On the 27th of October, 1834,

SHERIDAN

played Virginia, in his own play of that name. We had always supposed Virginia to be a Roman; but to use a little slang on this occasion, he was "a Greek"—what a delight! Irish brogue he had. This was tragedy upon stilts, but upon "hand-crutches." Knowles has been justly termed the Shakespeare of the present era of the drama, and to carry the similitude a little closer, he determined to prove, like the immortal bard who preceded him, that a divine author may be a very bad actor. The London critics, when they permitted, or tolerated the performance on the stage, of this truly good author, permitted him to himself in a position which his vanity made him say he was fitted for. I will not do him the injustice to follow him through the ~~error~~ of antics he was permitted to play; but turn with pleasure to the record of the reception given to his literary talent, leaving his acting where it is, from whence we labour can ~~remove~~ it—the theme of laughter to those whom he has made his brethren of the sock and buskin—the actors.

On the 8th of November, a public dinner was given to the dramatist, at the Masonic Hall, by many of our first citizens, in which Matthews was present; and where justice was awarded to one whose plays had for years delighted his hosts. Upon this occasion, and in such a scene as this, Knowles was home—his good humoured blarney making present pleased with himself, and consequently pleasing everybody. Whoever had good fortune to be present at this dinner, will remember it with feelings of pleasure—where of reason and the soul imparted warmth hilarity the present.

On 11th of November, Matthews, an of eleven years, again appeared before many of his old friends. In 1827, he told me in London, that if his life should be spared long enough, he was determined to contradict in person, the calumny circulated, by playing his "Trip to Ame-rice," word for word, before an American audience, and leaving them to judge on their own soil whether he had signedly misrepresented them. He expected acquittal was but a disagreement of his jury: and the result aided the speedy dissolution followed his return to England. It is a subject of regret me, that I arrived from Pittsburgh twenty-four hours too late to shake with him. He started New York the very day I returned Philadelphia.

XXVII.

Return from Pittsburgh. Eclipse of the Sun. Opening of the American Theatre, Walnut Street. Gratifying Reception. Mr. Oxley. Mr. A. Addams. Firemen's Fund Benefit. "The Two Orphans." "Tom and Jerry." Awkward Accident. Misconduct of Actors. "Last Days of Pompeii." E. T. Conner's Performance of Glaucon. Sheridan Knowles. Miss Emma Wheatley. Cooney and Blanchard, with their Dogs. Close of the first Season. Introduction of Mr. Hadaway to the

On the 20th of November, 1834, the Pittsburgh Theatre closed its Season, having open seventy-five nights, during Gouffé, (the Monkey man,) Miss Mary Duff, Mr. Charles Mason, Mrs. Sharpe, Cooper, and Miss Priscilla Cooper, (Mrs. Robert Tyler,) Mr. A. Addams, and Mr. Hill appeared.

On the 1st of December, I started with my family in Good Intent line, for Philadelphia; and in our witnessd an eclipse of the sun at the top of the Alleghany mountains, the most beautiful and sublime sight ever seen from a position—the shadow of darkness on the trees, looking indeed like the shadow of death, as described in Pilgrim's Progress.

On Monday, the 22nd of December, 1834, according to previous announcement, I opened American Theatre, Walnut Street the following company:—John Sefton, William Sefton, Conner, John Mills Brown, Charles Porter, J. G. Porter, Charles Thorne, A. Jackson, W. Kent, Schinotti, De Cordova, Lewellen, Rodney, Caldwell, Montayer, Sprague, Fanner, Ferrest, Wemyss, and Barrymore; Prompter, Mr. Huntley; Miss Mary Duff, Mrs. Kent, Thorne, Conduit, Cooke, (Mrs. Roper,) La Combe, Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Jackson, Miss Oharcock, Miss Ruth, Miss Pearce, Miss Gillespie. Barrymore was the Clemens, the leader of the orchestra; the play, "The Two Orphans," and farce, the "Dumb Bells." When I appeared as Rover, my reception was most gratifying to my professional pride. Not content with the usual demonstration on the appearance of an old favourite, as the curtain fell upon the last act of the play, I was loudly called for, and received by such applause as rarely falls to the lot of an actor. The same evening the "Dumb Belle" introduced John Sefton, after an absence of some years; he was admirably acted, and at the close of the performance, I was again called before the curtain, and bowing acknowledgments, an auditor proposed three cheers for the success of Mr. Wemyss and the American Theatre; which was given with a hearty good will.

The first play I produced, was "The Golden Farmer," in which Mr John Sefton laid the foundation of his theatrical fame. To him this part, which he at first refused to play, and which had grumbled about, I put my money into my pocket, than all the catalogue of parts he acted, put together. At the Theatre in New-York, under the management of Dinwiddie, he played this part one hundred times, during the first season, a thing without precedent in the annals of the American stage, either before or since. Mr. Sefton had a clause in his articles of agreement with me, by which he had the right to choose his part in the dramatic personae, where there was more than one low comedy part in a piece, and he insisted on playing Harry Hammer; but Barrymore insisted that he was the only man in the theatre fit for his "thief" in the "Golden Farmer." It was finally left to my decision, and although John Mills Brown played Hammer, much to the mortification of Sefton; yet I do not think my friend John has any cause to complain of the result, offended although he was by the choice, and first played Jammy Twitcher as an act of favour towards me in the management of the theatre. "Well, not of it," we know what we are; but the best among us know not what we may be.

I laid out a plan from which I never departed, to produce a new piece every Saturday night, and the steady perseverance in this plan, first gave the Walnut Street Theatre one night in the week, on which the manager could depend upon a good house by very moderate exertion. And Saturday still preserves its prerogative in that theatre.

On the 29th of December, I introduced to the Philadelphia public, their townsman, Mr. John Oxley, as a star, (one of minor importance; but who still continues to sparkle, while brighter constellations have been totally eclipsed.) As an actor, he was unknown; but he made an impression which has since enabled him to wander about, with the unassisted right of having his name placed in large letters on the play-bills, whenever he performs.

The "Amazon Sisters," followed the "Golden Farmer," which Miss Mary Duff and Mrs. Kent sustained the heroines in a masterly style. On the first of January, 1835, the "Deep, Deep Sea" was produced; but notwithstanding Barrymore's acknowledged tact, it failed to please, and was withdrawn after the second night. On the 5th of January,

MR. A. ADDAMS,

so long an absence from Philadelphia as have been almost forgotten, made his bow in a crowded house, in the character of Hamlet. He permitted me to choose, and would have been either Damon or Virginia. He pleased the audience, but in either of the two characters he would have carried them away with him triumphantly. Why Hamlet should be selected by so many clever young men to try their powers, is a subject upon which pages might be written. Of the characters of Shakspeare, the melancholy Prince of Denmark is the most difficult to attain excellence in. John Kemble, Charles Young, Edmund Kean, and Junius Booth, are the only ones who have, in my mind, approached the just conception of this part. I do not like Macready, with all his study—he is too cold and constrained: and although A. Addams' representation is on a par with E. Forrest's, yet they both want that finish so requisite to complete the picture, neither of them having any pretensions above mediocrity in this character. Addams played twelve nights, and each successive performance rising in favour, until he was fixed so firmly in the good opinion of the audience, that nothing has been able to destroy his popularity, and he has laboured harder than it—disappointing his audience frequently, yet always forgiven, and always received with kindness on his return to reason, to offend in a similar manner on some occasion when his services were needed.

By nature with a commanding person, not only a handsome, but an expressive countenance, a voice capable of being modulated in tones of the softest flute, yet powerful enough to burst the lungs of any one who tore a passion to rags, Mr. Addams should have been all competitors. He is the only one who ever had a shaking Forrest in his position, and made him tremble for his title of the "par excellence" American tragedian. The genius of Addams is superior to any American actor, but the study and application requisite to make the genius available, was wanting. While Forrest, by tact in the management of his affairs, was accumulating wealth, Addams was destroying both his pocket and his health by a course of dissipation which placed public opinion at defiance. His engagement with me, which should have been profitable to us. It was of no service to him, and a positive loss to me. No one laboured harder than myself to reclaim him. I have chosen to throw away my advantages, and I regret to all his.

On Tuesday, the 11th of January, 1841, place the benefit in aid of the Fund for the Support of Dr. Firestone. The house was filled; Addams acting Damon, and Oxley, Pythias. The following Address was written by Robert Conrad, on this occasion, and delivered by F. C. Wemyss:

ADDRESS.

The city slumbers: o'er its silent walls
Night's dusky mantle, soft and silent, falls;
Sleep o'er the world slow waves its wand of lead
And ready torpors wrap each sinking head;
Still'd is the stir of labour and of life,
Hush'd is the hum, and tranquil'd the strife;
Man is at rest, with all his hopes and fears,
The young forget their sports, the old their cares,
The grave or careless, those who joy or weep,
All rest contented on the arm of sleep.
Sweet is the pillow'd rest of beauty now,
And slumber settles upon her tranquil brow;
Bright are her dreams—yes, bright as heaven's own blue,
Pure as its joys, and gentle as its dew;
They lead her forth along the moonlit tide,
Her heart's own partner wandering by her side;
'Tis summer's eve: the soft gales scarcely rouse
The low-voic'd ripple, and the rustling boughs,
And, faint and far, some melting minstrel's tone
Breathes to her heart a music like her own.
When, hark! oh, horror! what a crash is there!—
What shriek is that which fills the midnight air?
'Tis fire—'tis fire! She wakes to dream no more;
The hot blast rushes through the blazing door,
The room is dimm'd with smoke, and, hark, that cry!
"Help! help!—will no one aid?—I die! I die!"
She seeks the element, shuddering at its height—
She turns again—the fierce flames mock her flight!
Along the crackling stairs they wildly play,
And roar, exulting, as they seize their prey;
"Help! help!—will no one come?" she cries no more,
But, pale and breathless, sinks upon the floor.

Will no one save thee? Yes, there yet is one Remains to save, when hope itself is gone;
When all have fled, when all but he would fly,
The fireman comes to rescue, or to die!
He mounts the stairs—he waves 'neath his tread,
He seeks the room, flames flashing round his head,

He bursts the door, he lifts her prostrate frame,
 And turns again to brave the raging flame.
 The fire-blast smites him with its stifling breath,
 The falling timbers menace him with death,
 And sinking floors his hurried steps betray,
 And ruin crashes round his desperate way:
 Smoke obscures, thousand cinders rise,
 Yet still he staggers forward his prize;
 He leaps from burning stair to stair—On! on!
 Courage!—one effort more, and all is won;
 The stair is passed, the blazing hall is braved,
 Still on—yet on—once more! thank heaven, she's saved!

The hardy seaman parts the storm to brave,
 For beck'ning waves warn him from the wave;
 The scoured helm 'neath the smoky cloud,
 For glory's bow is painted on the shroud;
 The helm also darts each shape of death,
 Not for fortune's gold, or glory's wrath;
 Selfish throbs within their breasts are known,
 No hope, no praise, no profit cheers them on,
 They ask no meed, no fame, and only seek Suffering, and protect the weak;
 This, howling midnight storm they woo,
 For the raging flames rush fearless through,
 Mount the frail rafter, bend the smoky hall,
 Or toil, unshrinking, 'neath the tottering wall;
 None other than those who, with fraternal blood,
 Dye the dread field, or tinge the shudd'ring flood;
 O'er their firm ranks no crimson banners wave,
 They dare, they suffer—not to slay, but save:
 At a sight, Hope smiles more heavenly bright,
 Pale, pensive Pity trembles with delight,
 Soft-eyed Mercy, stooping from above,
 Drops a tear—a tear of joy and love.

And should the fireman, generous, true, and brave,
 Fall, as he toils the weak to shield and save!
 Shall no kind friend, no ministering hand be found
 To pour the balm of comfort in his wound?
 Or perish, shall his orphan say,
 "He died for them—but what for us do they?"
 Nay is it thus should his toils requite?—
 Forbid it justice, gratitude, right;
 Forbid it, ye who dread what he endures,
 Forbid it, ye whose hearts he toils to cure,
 Forbid it, ye whose hoards he toils to save,
 Forbid it, all ye generous, just, and brave;
 And, above all, be you his friends, ye fair,
 For you were ever his especial care;
 Give to his cause your smiles, your gentle aid—
 The fireman's wounds are heal'd, the orphan's tears are stay'd.

the close of the performance I was called before the curtain, to return thanks on [redacted] of the committee, which I did.

The following evening, I produced "Zanthe," [redacted] upon Kenney's tragedy of "Hernani," [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] Chestnut Street Theatre, [redacted] Mr. Charles [redacted] for [redacted] Hero. The [redacted] of this splendid drama, which [redacted] vivid in [redacted] recollection of [redacted] audience, was simply this:—I [redacted] paring "Gustavus," with a [redacted] Masqué, to surprise [redacted] [redacted] when by [redacted] Maywood & Co. were apprised [redacted] my movements, and endeavoured to forestal them. Much [redacted] my [redacted] they announced "Gustavus," [redacted] produced [redacted] [redacted] night of my benefit. Barrymore, [redacted] [redacted] genius in a theatre [redacted] [redacted] at a loss, came in, [redacted] perceived by my face that something [redacted] [redacted] common [redacted] [redacted] I handed him the play-bill containing [redacted] announcement of [redacted] we intended to be our great card, [redacted] for which [redacted] Smith, Laudens, and the wardrobe keepers, [redacted] been working incessantly from the night [redacted] [redacted] opened. [redacted] [redacted] into a hearty laugh, and slapping [redacted] upon the shoulder, said, "Never mind, governor, we will give them a [redacted] [redacted] an Oliver; let them have 'Gustavus,' we will give them a [redacted] nation as well as a ball masque, and [redacted] lose [redacted] hour either. To [redacted]!"—and away he went. In something [redacted] [redacted] an hour, he returned in high glee. "All right, my master, [redacted] Wednesday shall see us in a [redacted] style before this audience, or I [redacted] forfeit my head." Wednesday [redacted] [redacted] us triumphantly successful. For eight [redacted] nights "Zanthe" [redacted] [redacted] theatre; but all is not gold [redacted] glitters. [redacted] [redacted] ing [redacted] received [redacted] four nights, two thousand [redacted] [redacted] sixty-five dollars, yet the average was unequal [redacted] to [redacted] [redacted] penditure. The extra expense nightly, was—b [redacted] band, 20 dollars, four drummers, 2 dollars, [redacted] hundred [redacted] twenty-five supernumeraries, 26 dollars 25 cents, wax candles, 140—35lbs every three nights, say 7 dollars, two pound red fire, [redacted] [redacted] dollars, [redacted] cents—7 dollars; in all, 63 dollars, in [redacted] [redacted] the [redacted] and properties, which [redacted] [redacted] in Barrymore's usual style of extravagance. And if "Zanthe" was found at [redacted] end of [redacted] season in debt to the treasury, [redacted] had given us a reputation for spectacle which has served the Walnut Street for capital, [redacted] since the memorable [redacted] of January, 1836. Its success [redacted] perfect, and taught the managers of the [redacted] critical theatre, "prudence." They [redacted] [redacted] attempted the same thing again; but quietly suffered [redacted] to enjoy my reputation as a theatre.

The favour with which "Zanthe" was received, induced me to revive "Tom and Jerry" with new scenes, and every property on the same scale as when first produced at the Chestnut Street, in 1823, under Warren and Wood. The 9th of February saw the curtain ready to rise upon a house of $1000 dollars. Every thing promised a rich harvest; all was marred by the misconduct of Mr. Wm. Sefton, who was the Jerry of the evening. His brother John first called attention during the opening chorus. It was evident he was in such a state of intoxication, that he got through his part, it would be a pity. My piece was evidently sacrificed, and I resolved to my mind to endure mortification as I might, resolved in his person, such an example never place again. At the conclusion of the first act, I was giving some directions to the master carpenter, being dressed at the time as Falstaff, in the "Masquerade," of the carpenters running across the stage, slipped and fell between my legs. In endeavouring to rise, he pressed me on the floor with him, falling on me and twisting my leg from him. This accident lamed me for life. For the rest of my life I was unable to walk without the aid of a stick, and never perfectly recovered the use of my knee. Therefore, I have cause to remember, "Tom and Jerry."

On the 23rd of March, "The last Days of Pompeii" was produced with twenty-two new scenes, painted by Mr. Smith. The design of the last scene was truly magnificent; but whether by accident or design, failed on the first night. I was present at this representation, for Barrymore had promised to outdo himself: and he certainly kept his word. The three first acts had proceeded much to the satisfaction of the audience, when Barrymore came forward and prepared them for a failure, by stating that the last act had never been seen. Blunder succeeded blunder, until, to the whole, a quick match which should have fired Vesuvius, was not, passing backwards forwards the traveller a squib, the only eruption which was to bury Pompeii. Down came the curtain amid the jeers and laughter of the audience. Barrymore, crazy, seized one of the lights, and, at the risk of having his eyes blown out, held the lamp until the powder ignited. A most brilliant display of fire-works succeeded. Elated, and determined that the audience should see what his last scene had been intended to produce, he insisted upon raising the curtain; the carpenter, whose duty it was to attend to this matter, left his post. Up came Barrymore himself, the fire-works blazing away all the time; and very well worth what they were—but powder won't burn for ever. Just as he succeeded in raising the curtain, the last spark exploded in a puff of powder, and all was darkness. Such a roar of laughter, and such a shower of hisses followed, that Barrymore ran out of the theatre to avoid the shame and would have been of far greater consequence, depriving Maywood and Co., of the sequel proved, of their most attractive, and always a great attraction upon, star of the season. On the 29th, Mr. Phillips was announced to play Mr. Beverly. He did not arrive, in consequence of an accident on the railroad; she, however, appeared the following evening. On the 7th of January, "Gustave" was produced. On the 12th, Emma Wheatley, and on the 11th, James Sheridan Knowles, with the wonderful Diavolo Antonio, and his equally wonderful partner. On the 20th, Knowles produced his new play of "The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green," playing Lord Winford himself, Emma Wheatley supporting the character of Mrs. Winford. His play made no great impression, and he acted only a few nights. After this, Knowles produced a series of lectures on English literature. Here "Richard was again;" in such a sphere he moved without a rival, and his lectures were warm in their expressions of admiration; but I doubt if he achieved much, however, by his literary fame. Mrs. Ternan's benefit, and last appearance, was announced for the 1st of February, she was playing Ariel in "The Tempest," Zulima in "Abou Hassan." The house was a full one, the weather very bad; and the season closed another night for that purpose, Feb. 19th, when she gave her last curtsy to the Philadelphia public, in the Princess "Mazamello," and "Cinderella," after a career of eight years in the United States, during which she had been very hard, and successfully too, to establish a taste for English opera; and her reception induced others, of higher talent, to cross the Atlantic in search of fortune. The season closed on the 21st of February, Mrs. Ternan's benefit; the pieces, "Fazio," and "The Young Widow." The purpose of closing, was the necessity of reducing the price of admission to a standard of next year.

I then travelled through the Alleghenies, and bring my fall season in Pittsburgh to a close, which commenced on the 17th of October, 1836, with A. A. Addams as Damon. He was always a great card with the citizens of Pittsburgh; and started the season with a house to the tune of 250 dollars; his receipts were 1000 dollars; after which I dispatched him to the mountains to play "Jack Cade" at the Walnut Street Theatre. He made his first attempt as a "star," aided by Miss Voe, and afterwards by Conner and Miss Mary Duff; he was not considered of sufficient importance. He had two benefits, neither of them worthy of a common favour with him. Aided on the occasions by other stars, ■ first house amounted to 195 ■ cents, and ■ second to 158 dollars 75 cent-.

Music being the order of the day, I made an arrangement with John Thompson, Norton, Hunt, Trust and Cioffi, ■ way to New Orleans, to stop four nights ■ Pittsburgh. A subscription paper was well filled ■ insure ■ from loss in this attempt, and on the ■ of November my ■ presented the unusual spectacle of five hundred places secured; even ■ ■ termed the "sics" were taken. Night approached, but with ■ came not the stars of ■ evening; ■ canal boat bringing ■ the very consolatory information, that ■ party, in despite of warning, ■ insisted on taking Leech's ■ of boats ■ of the Express line, and that in all probability ■ gentlemen ■ arrive about ■ on the following morning. The deception practised by this line ■ proved a source of annoyance from which there was no redress; but I had ■ ■ in Philadelphia, and ■ therefore ■ eyes open. I had to call upon Murdoch ■ ■ by playing Dick Deakall in "My Aunt," and returned between two and three hundred dollars at the door. Nor was this the worst ■ the loss: at least half of those who had subscribed for the four nights at once withdrew their names, and several were so ■ offended as to ■ from visiting the theatre again during the ■ it was not, therefore, in the best of humours that I met the "absentees" at the ■ table. They performed on the second of November ■ 280 dollars, on the fourth to 191 dollars, ■ on ■ to 132 dollars. The three houses scarcely yielded ■ ■ would have done, and one night out of four lost altogether. For this disappointment I received only an ■ of fifty dollars ■ original engagement.

On the ■ of November Mr. and Mrs. Ternan appeared ■ "Fazio" ■ "Persenation." On the 20th ■ November, Miss Booth (now ■ Charles Burke) took her ■ benefit. ■ young lady improved rapidly in her profession, ■ ■ early period of her career gave promise of her future popularity. She was a great favourite with a portion of the audience, although her style of acting was by some considered as coarse and vulgar—wanting the ■ necessary to ■ sonate a lady upon the stage, and approaching in assumption of character nearer to the manners of a ■ L ■ beat us all this season in the receipts of his benefit; and ■ the 28th of November the theatre closed, as usual, with my benefit, Miss Ann Waring playing "Theresa." In six weeks Addams, Murdoch, Miss Von Hill, Norton, Hunt, Trust, Cioffi, Mr. and Mrs. Ternan, Mr. Connor, and Miss Mary Duff appeared, ■ ■ worthy ■ Pittsburgh could ■ with justice complain of the want of ■

On the 19th of October—"Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Ascalon!" Mr. Abbot made his first appearance at the Chestnut Street Theatre as Hamlet. "Oh Critics!"

Do the actors in England suppose Americans are totally ignorant of the position they occupy in their profession in their own country? Abbot, in his best day, never aspired to even second rate parts in tragedy in London, where he was admitted to be the best walking gentleman belonging to the British stage, and capable of better things, having pretensions as a genteel comedian in repute. We could have tolerated him as a light comedian, superior in every respect to Mr. Balla, who followed him to this country, and allowed his claims to the foremost rank in that walk of the drama; as a tragedian, capable of playing Hamlet, it was impossible he could succeed, and any mortification he may have met in this career is to be attributed to his own foolish vanity. Whoever had the pleasure to meet him in private society must remember him with feelings of regret, that he is not longer spared to occupy a place at the festive board, he so much graced, where few men possessed so happy a talent of making himself generally agreeable. Whatever may be the opinion of his merit as an actor, placed beyond the sphere of his ability, as a companion all must yield to him their full approbation.

"He was a fellow not worth."—SWANSON.

Miss Emma Wheatley was the next star, followed by the ever successful Celeste, producing with great effect "Devil's Daughter," and commencing the announcement of her one hundred and one (more or less) farewell benefits, with "Victorie," and "Spirit Bride."

made his appearance in Philadelphia on the 20th of November, as Vapid, in the "Dramatist," and the Three Singers, in the "Three and the Deuce." He was a sprightly, dashing, good-looking fellow, possessed of more impudence than talent, seldom knowing the words of his part, and keeping the audience in good humor by never allowing them an opportunity of discovering his weak point. His first engagement was, I am told, a profitable one to the theatre; but, the novelty worn off, such a result could never be expected again. How I hate bastard starrng! Why don't the public finish the matter by turning a few of them adrift! Where talent is really overwhelming in its effect, the starring system may be endured; but if ever a well regulated drama is to take root and flourish, the profession must be stripped of all exotism.

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

On the 17th of December, 1836, one of the most of all droll comedians appeared in the person of

MR. JOHN REEVE,

another, and a bright victim to conviviality. From an actor whose gibes and merriment did keep his audience in a roar, descending to the most buffoon, uttering his own coarse and vulgar jokes to make the million laugh, and the judicious grieve; rarely treating his audience to the words of the author, but by his rare comic powers, retaining possession of their kindly feelings to the last moment of his career. He had endowed him with such rich powers of mimicking, that he dared to enter the field against the Matthews, on his own ground, and was successful, in a piece called "1, 2, 3, 4, 5, by Advertisement," in which he acted on his own stage in Philadelphia.

As an actor, he was a spoilt child. From the night of his first appearance in the English Opera House, he gained a place in the good graces of his audience; he was a "droll," was little inferior to Liston, the great buffoon of the English stage. He was not without the excitement or privation of a travelling actor's life. His first attempt was made in the metropolis; and notwithstanding his erratic course, to the end of his professional existence, he possessed the un-der favour of the audience at the Adelphi Theatre. When he played Bob Acres, in the play of "The Rivals," in Philadelphia, he found himself charged with the high crime of being an imitator of Barton, whose popularity had been acquired by a close resemblance of his poor in Reeve's acting. This is not an uncommon occurrence in theatricals; first impressions, if favorable, bearing great weight in the minds of auditors. Miss O'Neil is said to have been rejected in London, as an imitator of Miss O'Neil—Elliston, in the same manner, of Tom Cunningham of Bath—Mrs. Jordan, of Mrs. Brown, of the York Theatre, who, in the same manner, shared the same fate as Miss Walstein before the London public. While the imitators reaped golden opinions, the real Simon Pures was rejected as base counterfeits; Reeve's success in America was owing more to his intemperate habits, than any other cause; increased, perhaps, by the error of finding himself considered second to the best artist whose greatest merit was, that he could imitate such an actor as John Reeve successfully.

On the first of January, Mr. and Mrs. Wood appeared in the opera of "The Maid of Judah," aided by his first appearance on the Philadelphia stage, in opera.

BROUGH,

"There was a jolly miller once I lived on the River Dee,
He drank and sang from morn to night, no more blythe than he;
And thus the burden of his song; for ever used to be—
I care for nobody, no I, since nobody cares for me."

Here is at once a character of my good natured friend Brough, a better companion over a boon or a bottle, than upon stage. As a singer, a valuable adjunct to Mr. Wood, and like a satellite, deriving lustre from their superior, travelled throughout the United States, respected wherever he went, and his absence regretted his loss of a capital good fellow, ever ready to perform a action, seeking his reward in the consciousness of having performed a pleasing duty of his being. Long may his jovial laugh ring the board of festivity, and success crown wherever he goes. His name in theatrical must be associated "La Somnambula," and will descend to posterity, so long the charming music of opera retains a place in lady's musical portfolio.

"La Somnambula" was for the first time in Philadelphia, on the 11th of February, 1836, and for fifteen consecutive nights held possession of the town—the Chestnut Street Theatre closing on the of February, for the season, of Wood elsewhere, preventing a longer stay; having in Philadelphia, 15th January until the 20th February.

CHAPTER XXX.

to the Moon. Sol. Smith the Man-monkey. "The Spirit of '76." Comey and Blanchard. The "Infernal Machine." Opening of the Theatre in Washington. A Drunken Ghost in "let." "The Jewess." Mr. Murdoch. A Curious Interesting News of the Capture of Santa Close of the Walnut Street. The Wilmington Theatre. Indifference of the people of Wilmington to Theatricals.

American Theatre in Walnut Street opened for the season on the of August, 1836, with "Richard the Third," Booth playing Richard to 556 dollars; quite a bearing prospect. On the 29th, Addams played Othello to Booth's Iago, to 501 dollars. Mr. Forbes, Miss Ves, and Rice, (Jim Crow,) succeeded Addams and Booth.

On Saturday, the 5th of September, the first new piece was produced under the title of "Discoveries in the Moon," (Rice was the author,) founded on the well-remembered Assa. It was very successful, and withdrawn only because Rice's engagements would not permit a longer stay. "Bone Squash Diabola," for which Clemens had written the music, and Landers prepared the machinery, was transferred to the Bowery Theatre, New York. Thus we lost the credit of its original production.

Furber and Miss Ves did not add to the receipts of my treasury; but on the 15th of September, Sol Smith, the cherished favourite of the south-western theatres, made his bow in Philadelphia, as Mawworm, in the "Hypocrite." Gouffe played on the same occasion; and here we see the difference of value between intellectual and physical acting. (I am indebted to my friend Oxley for the observation). The gentleman and actor received from the citizens of Philadelphia, on his benefit night, 140 dollars, while the man-monkey, on the previous night, received 444 dollars. O tempora! O mores!

On the 23rd of September I produced a National Drama entitled "The Spirit of '76," in which the costumes, scenery, &c., of the times were carefully preserved. It was played seven nights, to an average of 257 dollars, and was then withdrawn, to make room for Coney and Blanchard, and their dogs, who held possession of the theatre for fourteen nights. On the 16th of October, Mr. Ward took his benefit, previous to his departure to join Maywood and Co., at Baltimore and Washington. Mrs. E. Knight and Mr. Hill both played a short engagement. On the 24th of October, Mr. Benjamin Brewster, a young lawyer of much promise, dramatised the "Infidel," from Dr. Bird's novel of that name. I regret that I was in Pittsburgh on this occasion, for I think that his play deserved a better fate than it met at the hands of my stage manager.

The next piece was a horrible perpetration, under the title of "Fieschi; or the Infernal Machine." All I can say about it is, that it was played to infernal bad homes, and consigned to the infernal regions, with the blessings of the actors. Hackett played one night, on the 16th of November; and on the 21st, Addams attempted Richard the Third. Booth and Rice, (Jim Crow,) played: the former, Sir Giles Overreach, and the latter in "Oh, Hush!" on the 26th, to 857 dollars.

On the 25th of December, 1835, I opened the Old Theatre, in Washington city, with "Theresa," ■■■ "Kill or Cure;" following it by Booth, who played an engagement, profitable to ■■■ as well as himself. Everything ■■■ to promise a good season; but, notwithstanding the aid of A. Addams, Mrs. E. Knight, Mary Duff, Signor Vivalla, and many others, the first fortnight was the only one attended with profit, and I closed it on the 8th of February following; one incident only occurring worth record—a drunken ghost, in "Hamlet!"—A spirit steeped in spirits! Poor Paddy Field, could you have found no other part to disgrace yourself in! Although no subject for laughter, yet it was too comical to see this ghost staggering across the stage, and then, in despair, missing the ~~entrance~~ by which he should have left it. A fellow-feeling for a fellow-falling, I presume, alone induced Booth to proceed, who laughed as heartily as any of the audience.

On the 15th of February, James Wallack commenced a short and very unprofitable engagement. I thought I had achieved a great triumph in obtaining his services. Had I known what I discovered afterwards—that in concluding this engagement I was enabling Maywood & Co. to continue, for twelve nights longer, their successful career with the Woods, which Mr. Wallack's time would have interrupted, I should not have been so well pleased with the idea. People are sometimes too cunning for themselves.

The Annual Benefit promised to the Firemen's Fund took place on the 18th of February, and even with the aid of Mr. Wallack, I am sorry to add, was a failure, 39 dollars, 25 cents, being all the money I had to pay over to their treasurer on the occasion. Wallack's last night, on which occasion he played Rienzi, was only 68 dollars. He never on any ~~occasion~~ proved a fortunate star to me.

On Monday, February 20th, "The Jewess" was produced. This was an alteration by myself from a drama called "Esther the Jewess." The only merit it contained was its pageantry, which was the most superb of any thing yet offered to the public of Philadelphia. The allegory, headed by Time, representing every nation on the face of the globe, was of such an imposing nature, that I boldly assert, the last scene has never been equalled in America, or surpassed anywhere. ~~The~~ beauty and variety of costume, formed a ~~feature~~ on ~~which~~ the eye rested with feelings of delight. The far-famed "Naiad Queen" had no single scene that could ~~compare~~ with the last scene of the "Jewess," although as a whole it far surpassed it, having something like interest attached to its plot, and a succession of brilliant scenes, while the "Jewess" boasted of but one, but that one was a chef d'œuvre. It was played fourteen nights, and withdrawn to make room for "Norman Leslie."

This piece was dramatized by F. O. Wemyss, in consequence of Hamblin demanding half the receipts of each night's performance for the use of Miss Medina's drama from the same novel.

Murdoch, _____ entered into an engagement to _____ him _____ per month, for three months, _____ proceeds of his benefits, made his first appearance _____ Walnut Street Theatre, under my management, as Rover in "Wild Oats," _____ the 12th of March. He told _____ one, in particular confidence, and that _____ repeated _____ body, _____ As had _____ interest in the receipts on _____ nights, so that all the advantage I expected to reap from _____ engagement was lost, and at the expiration of the time I _____ renewing it, _____ making _____ any further offer, but _____ _____ Hadaway, Connor, and others regularly engaged in _____ theatre. Thus terminated, on the 2nd of July, the attempt to make a "star" of Mr. James E. Murdoch _____ city—not much to _____ satisfaction of either party. _____ year _____ not ripe.

On the 25th of May a scene occurred of such a character, not often witnessed within the walls of a theatre. The performance announced was "Othello," and "Perfection;" the proceeds to be appropriated in _____ of the people of Texas, the public sympathy being deeply excited by the fall of the Alamo, and the infamous butchery of Fanning and _____ associates. News of _____ capture of Santa Anna arrived in the city, and Mr. Coffee, of the Exchange Reading Room, knowing that Colonel Childers of Texas was at the Walnut Street Theatre, _____ the Texan Committee, came directly to the theatre with a slip received from New York. Colonel Thomas Florence, a _____ of the Committee, read it from the boxes, eliciting the most enthusiastic cheers. Colonel Childers addressed _____ in a complimentary strain, and alluded to the _____ made by _____ Anna, "to place his blood-red banner _____ Mexico on the dome _____ Capitol of Washington;" and reversing the picture, adverted to the period, when _____ improbable _____ Spangled Banner, aiding the Lone _____ of Texas, _____ from the gilded domes of Mexico, as a sign _____ tyrant _____ fallen—that the people _____ free.

_____ theatre closed _____ the _____ of July, with the "Boys in '76," and "Black Eyed Susan."

The Pittsburgh Theatre opened on the 2nd of April, _____ spring season, and closed on _____ of May. The _____ appeared, with the exception of _____ Oline, presented not a very _____ array.

On the _____ May _____ opened the Theatre in Wilmington, Delaware, a very little, _____ affair, but out of place in _____ city. Notwithstanding Connor, Miss Mary Doff, Murdoch, Oxley, and even Miss Fanny Jarman appeared, in six weeks the whole receipts amounted only to 886 dollars, an _____ 2½ dollars a night. Booth could only play to 23 dollars. It was impossible to excite sufficient interest about the drama. With the exception of a few, the citizens neither cared about the actors or the theatre.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Opening of the Season of 1838. "The Bronze Horse." Out of evil sometimes cometh good. Booth. Funn. His melancholy fate Forest. Mr., Mrs., and Miss Barnes. Success of "Lafitte." Farewell engagement of Mr. Towner. Mr. Duvilla. Grand success of "Thalaba." New play by David Paul Brown.

On closing the season, on the 4th of July, 1838, I applied to the stockholders to replace the stage, which had become positively unsafe. They refused; but Mr. Henry G. Freeman kindly gave me permission, if I thought proper, to do it at my own expense. As I intended to open my season with the "Bronze Horse," I was compelled to forgo the exhibition of scenic pieces, for which the Walnut Street had acquired a reputation, superior even to the Bowery, in New York; or have the stage relaid. Of two evils I chose the least; and, $10,000 of $1,000 thousand dollars, $10,000 Sanders, and his assistants, completed the alterations.

A new difficulty arose. Mrs. Waring, upon permission, had been acting for six weeks in New York, with Mr. Hamblin, in the piece composed by Mr. Henry Allen, expressly for her voice. I wanted her assistance; she refused to return, and refused her engagements. Mr. and Mrs. Murry, also, having their overtures from Mr. Barry, violated their contract. Mr. and Mrs. Haupt, who were engaged, refused to go to Philadelphia, having made their arrangements with me for obtaining their own theatre with Pelby. Mr. Collingbourne, Mr. and Mrs. Watson, I voluntarily released. Mrs. [Name] engaged at the [Name] Theatre, New York: [Name] her kindness in foregoing, under [Name] circumstances, a [Name] eligible situation, was [Name] means of opening at [Name] appointed time, but not with the [Name] pointed piece. The "Bronze Horse" was not produced until the first of August; and is the first piece upon record that ever ran fifty nights, in one season, in the city of Philadelphia.

I opened on Saturday, the 27th of August, with the "Veto of Calais," and the "May Queen." The money saved by the misconduct of these actors proved a source of profit on the season, which, for the first time, netted nearly five thousand dollars; the success of the "Bronze Horse" rendering it unnecessary for me to supply the place of any of the delinquents until after Christmas. "Verily, out of evil sometimes cometh good." Russel Smith increased his reputation tenfold by the scenery; and repaired to Boston, to the New Theatre, (The Idon,) to paint the scenery, and also superintend the machinery. Mr. John Wiser supplied his place during his absence; and in the Walnut Street Theatre acquired the first practical lessons in the art of scene-painting, in which he, also, has become an adept.

Booth was the first star, commencing with the "Stranger," on the 6th of September. I did not wish to break off the connection of Booth's name and the Walnut Street Theatre, or I should have declined this engagement; it was paying a premium to keep him from performing at any other theatre in the city. Mr. and Miss Cooper followed—the "Bronze Horse" still continuing his career. On the 8rd of October, Mr. Finn appeared in the "Clandestine Marriage;" an actor, whose dreadful fate in the Lexington steam-boat makes his name which never will be forgotten. To me he addressed the last letter he ever wrote upon the subject of theatricals, and, in all probability, the last he ever penned; and I cannot do better than subjoin it, although it was two years from the present time. He was ice-bound on the western side of the Alleghany mountains, and from Pittsburgh had addressed me a letter of complaint; the subject of which I was anxious to remove. He remained to act (as he passed through Philadelphia, returning from that unfortunate engagement), for Celeste's benefit, at the Chestnut Street Theatre; and, so delayed, became a passenger on board the Lexington; whether perishing by fire or water has never been ascertained.

"United States Hotel, Saturday Evening.

"DEAR WHEATON,

"I did not receive your letter till after I had finished acting, or should have replied before.

"I think my explanation of circumstances will exonerate Mr. Jackson from having unnecessarily communicated the contents of your 'confidential letter.' From the tenor of your first letter, he naturally concluded it was left optional with him to answer; which he had no hesitation in doing, previous to the receipt of your counteracting letter; and on my claiming the fulfilment of that promise, he was obliged, in self defence, to state your sentiments. Nor did he consent to make another engagement till the Wednesday following, and then only after consulting with Mr. Simpson.

"You admit that the failure of the mails was the cause of his not receiving the one assenting to the removal. This did not reach him till last Sunday; but what was he to do, in the absence of all information, but decide for the best? I yawn by the circumstance of taking a long, expensive, and hazardous journey; the one from Pittsburgh being the most dreadful I ever encountered—two nights out, in an open board box, half free to death, and nearly buried in snow—because they were the first, though severe penances, for committing a most glaring act of folly. I took exception to what seemed a suspicious movement without sufficient motive, because the time subsequent to the expiration of the first week was unfilled by any one else, and had, (apparently, at least,) a wish to exclude me from participating in the next, for the mere purpose of excluding me. I have no reason to complain of Pittsburgh; as it was better than I anticipated; the people suffering, and those who could afford to pay for amusement preferred sleighing. In better times, and at another season, I have no doubt the arrangements—even after sharing 150 dollars—would have been a paying one; but I am convinced it is the wrong season for Pittsburgh. The navigation is stopped, there are no boatmen or travellers, the labouring classes are out of employ, and I defy the power of any professional locomotive to draw them.

"MY JACKSON told me the whole of your communication about myself, 'also the words, until you hear from me again;' but this did not alter the position in which I was placed, because we had no reason to suppose that it would be in two days, as you did not state when. It is evident there was a conspiracy of the elements to thwart our prospects, in which I was a material sufferer in mind, body, and estate; and we can only fall back upon the melancholy consolation afforded by the proverb, 'had now, better another time;' but that other time must be the better by being so."

"Yours (December excepted),

"HARRY J. FINN."

Old associations had rendered me anxious to continue in the good opinion of Finn. Strange as it may appear, he had been the tragedy hero of Butler's Company; had been at the Haymarket Theatre, in London, where he was the original Thomas in the "Sleep Walker," and by his excellent acting of an insignificant part, aided materially in the success of the piece. He then returned to his native country, (for Finn was an American actor, although he never laid claim to any indulgence upon that score, but stood before his audience on his own merit,) and became one of the managers of the old Federal Street Theatre in Boston, and finally a "Star," and one of the brightest in the galaxy. No one need shrink to have their merits weighed by the standard that gave pre-eminence to Finn: his Lord Ogilby, his Philip Garbois, his Paul Schack, his Beau Chatterley, have never been equalled on the American stage; and although it has latterly been the fashion to laugh at his Hamlet and his Romeo, I have seen them worse acted by gentlemen who claim the dignified appellation of tragedians. During his engagement, he acted Lord Ogilby, Paul Pry, Philip Garbois, Paul Schack, Dr. Pangloss, J. Black, Beau Chatterley, Mawworm, Jack Humphries, and Richard the Third!!

On the 10th of October, Mr. and Mrs. Tarnan played a short and profitable engagement, proving that it may be ous sometimes to descend from the stilts, and change your ground in [redacted] city. No one understands this better than Mr. H. Forrest, who tries the [redacted] all round, and sometimes, although rarely, refuses a better for a worse offer, by [redacted] keeping up the excitement that [redacted] to his popularity.

Mr., Mrs., and Charlotte Barnes, played three or four nights, [redacted] now the "Bronze Horse" [redacted] suffered a set, to make way [redacted] "Lafitte," [redacted] which caused the destruction [redacted] Bowery Theatre, New York, in 1838, and the announcement [redacted] which here created more than usual excitement. [redacted] was [redacted] Friday, October 20th, the audience leaving [redacted] with a determination to give it [redacted] the following night. [redacted] a few judicious alterations, the chief [redacted] the arrangement of the Pirate's Island, altered [redacted] sentence. What failed so signally [redacted] the previous night was received with cheers on its [redacted] representation and keeps possession of the stage to the present hour, as a favourite drama. [redacted] was played for twenty-nights: Conner, Mrs. Willis, and Mrs. Preston, not forgetting Woodhull, gained much credit, while Percival, by whom it [redacted] patched together, as Cudjoe, made quite a [redacted] able impression [redacted] his audience. The music [redacted] well [redacted], [redacted] what is of more importance, well sung; and no piece could [redacted] more satisfactory to the management, after having [redacted] narrowly escaped total damnation.

On [redacted] eventful 7th of November, the night the Pennsylvania Theatre opened, "Lafitte" was played at the Walnut [redacted] to [redacted] dollars, a proof that the audience who support it, do not come in such numbers as supposed from the northern Liberties; a little tact and better judgment in the building, would have rendered a Theatre of their [redacted] profitable. I was [redacted] sanguine in my hopes, and [redacted] the disappointment: [redacted] crippled [redacted] resources. But the general crash,—suspension of bank payments, desolation and ruin in the community,—not the building of this place, from the loss of which I had [redacted] fully recovered,—caused my future difficulties.

On the [redacted] of December, Mr. Deville, a gentleman whom [redacted] known with Macready under the name [redacted] Stuart, [redacted] peared in a [redacted] written drama, entitled "Minerali." In [redacted] position [redacted] place him [redacted] an actor, would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer: at one moment he would strike [redacted] some point so excellent, that the audience testified their approbation in a burst of genuine applause, the sound of which [redacted] scarcely subsided, when he would do something so totally ridiculous, as to raise doubts as to his sanity; and so laughed at, and so applauded, [redacted] to [redacted] nights, when [redacted] T[redacted] Shylock convinced [redacted] he was non compos mentis, [redacted] opinion, however reluctantly, I am compelled to acquiesce. Bann got up "Manfred" for him and Miss

Onion in Spring Lane, which was his last appearance, and there ended his reputation as "a star."

After a short interval, during which hammer, paint, and nails were busily employed, "Thalaba" was placed before the audience on Monday, the 10th of February, producing six nights, 8285 dollars, the greatest amount of any piece I ever played at the Walnut Street Theatre. It was not more one-third of the amount expended upon "Zuitho," bringing a return, as compared with much-talked-of drama, into the treasury, during its run, more than double the amount of money. On the 15th of March, David Briggs Brown's play of "St. John's Prophet," was acted for Conner's benefit 1000 dollars. This accomplished author, who was present, bore the hatchery,—for it was more than murder,—of his own misfortune, lives in his own recollection. Whatever he thought, he uttered no complaints; but I was conversant with a secret, which, if he continues to write for the stage, may atone for the mortification he must have endured, and prevent the possibility of a similar occurrence: Never permit a play to be brought forward for an actor's benefit night,—it does not receive the necessary attention, either of scenery or dresses, added to which the performers seldom know the words of their parts, and more than two rehearsals can never be obtained. The feeling of interest in the result, beyond receiving the nightly charges for the incidental expenses of the theatre, will lay aside one's own business to promote the advantage exclusively of one member of his Company.

CHAPTER XXXII.

A Liberal offer! Suspension of Specie Payments. Mrs. H. in "The Vision of the Sea." Conner, as William the King. The Favel Family. An Amusing Performance. and Mrs. Keeley. Miss Ellen Gibbs. Cooke's Band in Philadelphia. Mr. Director of the Theatre.

On the 31st day of July, 1837, my first lease of three years expired. My gas was to be introduced at the Walnut Theatre in the fall, and I also wished the stockholders of the Walnut St. Theatre at the same time. It was the part of Mr. Freeman, who, although only the treasurer, was in fact the sole director of the place; emanated from the board of directors, consisting of Montelius, Wickersham, Paddle, Lajas, and Freeman, the proposition made to me was, to renew my lease at an advance rent of one thousand dollars, for one year ~~and~~ and they would introduce the gas. Liberal! thrice liberal offer. A noble return for all my exertions—for all the improvements I had made to their property—but not an unusual one with landlords, and ~~landlord~~ companies are the worst of landlords. ~~It~~ can fix the evil upon the shoulders of no one individual; ~~every~~ every act of grace is the work of ~~each~~ particular agent. It would not at that time have answered my purpose to throw up the theatre; but if I had done so, as the result proved, it would have saved me from ruin. ~~Mr.~~ Cooke, whose squirean company had been so successful in New York, came over to see me, in company with Mr. Amherst, on the subject of occupying the Walnut Street Theatre as a circus. My lease forbidding me to under-let the theatre, without the written permission of the board of agents, rendered ~~it~~ necessary to consult those gentlemen. ~~Mr.~~ Cooke's offer was a most liberal one—three thousand dollars, for three months, with full ~~guaranty~~ security, to be deposited in any bank of Philadelphia, nominated by the stockholders, to leave the property in ~~the~~ ~~condition~~ he should receive it.—The conditions of my lease, ~~requiring~~ an advance payment of 1000 dollars, and ~~the~~ ~~payment~~ per ~~week~~ after that, until all paid, the ~~payment~~ ~~was~~ ~~making~~ ~~at~~ the expiration of one week after the opening for the winter season, left the stockholders in ~~the~~ ~~payment~~ six months, from the 31st of January. Unfortunately, all ~~the~~ rent was paid before this offer was made; and, not satisfied with a rent which they have never received before or since, and the profit which would accrue to them from the rent of the barn, which would have been 1000 dollars, ~~they~~ ~~refused~~ their assent, unless I agreed to pay them 1000 dollars for it. As they had already 2000 dollars of mine in their hands, I declined, stating at the same time, that if they refused their consent, arrangements would be made by Mr. Cooke, before he left the city, to build a circus in Chestnut Street. Mr. Freeman laughed at the idea; but I had pledged myself to Messrs. McIntyre and Rogers, who held control of the lot, in the event of our negotiation being broken off, that I would bring Mr. Cooke to them. I apprised Mr. Henry G. Freeman of the fact; he was still obstinate, reminding me of the lawyer ~~instructing~~ his client: "I send you a fat goose, pluck him, he will bear it." ~~But~~ I was tired of being plucked in so ~~barbarous~~ a manner. The stockholders of the Walnut Street Theatre, or their agents, were the sole cause of the erection of Cooke's circus, since altered by Burton, and now possessed by Walsh and Co., Mr. Cooke was anxious to occupy the Walnut Street Theatre; the fame of his New York exploits had made the citizens of Philadelphia anxious to see him. The avarice of Mr. H. ~~Freeman~~ ~~freed~~ him to erect ~~the~~ ~~circus~~

I introduced him to the gentlemen named above, and all the preliminary arrangements were made before Mr. Cooke left the city. When past recall, the agents told me they would give their assent, if I could prevail on Mr. Cooke to stop operations. This I had denied, they were determined to have, and so proposed and so obtained an increase of rent for the year 1837, with the fact of a new agent staring me in the face by way of a pleasant opposition. This was my punishment, fool that I was, with a building in the city, of my own, might have answered my purpose, until I had a better one. I have said "no;" as it was, for 13 or 1400 dollars outlay in gas fixtures the stockholders received an interest of 1000 dollars per year!!! Is it wonderful the manager should have been ruined! He ought to have been a wiser man, and said, "no: the gas I must have, but I will pay no more rent; or, at most, the interest on the cost of introducing it"—and I would have got it. But, throughout my whole dealings with the board of agents, the more I yielded, the more they demanded, until, provoked by insolence, I hastily severed a connexion, in which they seemed to think I had too large a stake, to be driven away from the possession, so long as it was in my power to retain it.

While Cooke was erecting his building, I made up my mind to a long summer season and a late opening in the fall. Here again I decided wrong. My season could not have been worse; and, by not being open at the usual time, the pit audience had found another place of amusement; and thus the main support of the Walnut Street Theatre was for the present destroyed.

In proceeding to Pittsburgh, I adopted the plan of having no Stars; but taking my whole Walnut Street company to produce, in rapid succession, those pieces which had been most successful in Philadelphia; and Russel Smith and his brother were started off, one month in advance, to prepare the scenery.

On the 10th of April, I opened to 300 dollars. Mr. Conner not arriving, the Wrecker's Daughter was changed to the Stranger; and so well was the play acted, that, for once, the Pittsburghers burst out into a hurra for their manager. This was, numerically, the strongest company ever seen in the Iron City, accompanied by the adjunct, for the first time, of a corps de ballet. The company with which I opened the theatre possessed more talent; but the orchestra never was so complete, and now the efforts of actors were appreciated, not as four years ago, laughed at. The first week's business produced sixteen hundred and twenty-three dollars and seventy-five cents, or an average of two hundred and seventy dollars per night.

Well done, Pittsburgh—this, too, without the aid of a Star. The first drama was "Zantha," not liked; a little grumbling; [redacted] night's receipts [redacted] 37 [redacted]. The [redacted] was "Laffie"—he no, 461 [redacted] 87 cents; a great hit. Then came the "Horse;" but, as if from perversity, it was pronounced "a humbug," and the manager's character, in consequence, [redacted] fifty per cent. discount. It was [redacted] collently done. [redacted] the secret, it must be told: [redacted] Celeste, on her way to the West, [redacted] arrived, [redacted] play, [redacted] her services were declined!! She, or rather her husband, Elliot, went grumbling [redacted] his way, leaving [redacted] to meet all sorts of "blasphemies" for my refusal. But I had determined no Star should act during this season; for I well knew, if I took one, I must, perforce, take all the rest, or give offence. Besides, I had, at a very early period of my management, made known to all these "wanderers," that, as my time in Pittsburgh was always limited to a certain number [redacted] weeks, announced [redacted] begin[redacted] of [redacted] season, they [redacted] [redacted] engage[redacted] [redacted] with [redacted] before I left Philadelphia, [redacted] up their "books" without Pittsburgh. To this rule I rigidly adhered; [redacted] to that, [redacted] than any other cause, were the citizens of Pittsburgh indebted for [redacted] of the brightest Stars, while [redacted] [redacted] height. Sergeant [redacted] play of "Ion," brought [redacted] good house; [redacted] "Norman Leslie," four;—quite complimentary to [redacted] pride as an author.

"The Jewess," on the [redacted] of May, brought [redacted] 63 cents, with an excellent box sheet for Monday; but here, a "malignant star" crossed my path. On Sunday, [redacted] 14th, [redacted] heard of—THE SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS; and, [redacted] [redacted] May, actually turned [redacted] [redacted] over 200 dollars, [redacted] [redacted] change. [redacted] a row—such swearing—[redacted] at [redacted] banks, others at [redacted] theatre,—all declaring I had specie enough [redacted] would not [redacted] it out. I might [redacted] specie for 500 [redacted] I had deposited with Mr. Cooke [redacted] morning, which I could have had, and as much more, for [redacted] ing; but I was so amused by the quaint speeches—half funny, half threatening, that [redacted] his counter during the day—as every new refusal for change was answered with—banks stopped payment, that I forgot my own business, until the doors of the theatre opened, and I found myself in a very awkward predicament. One hundred dollars of specie, which I promised to return in the morning, was all I could raise; and I only made bad worse by paying that out. If the thought had only struck me in the afternoon, I might have sold tickets by the handful, by promising silver in change [redacted] parties [redacted] four or more, that is, a front bench. Under this arrangement—during the panic—I might have filled the house every night at [redacted] slight cost of "thirty dollars discount." Two hundred and fifty dollars of specie, nightly, would have secured me five hundred dollars per night. How readily was this pointed out, after the fact became apparent to every one. It was a decided miss; for the citizens of Philadelphia were strong upon this time, that, specie was no specie, they determined to come, buying two tickets, one for present, one for future use, when they could not obtain change for their notes.

Mr. James Wallack was permitted to come through without being allowed to play, declaring it was the first time in a city in which he refused his proffered services, a city in which he acted. My worthy friend, Finn, also used his rhetoric, to convince me I ought to be in his favour; and, when I would not, "then," said he, "I'll be yours—dine with me, and I will make you drunk, or I'll be of spite." I don't know whether he kept his word: but I saw him comfortably seated on the stage, at nine o'clock in the morning, on his way East.

"The Jewess," was below par. "Thalaba" mustered only 250 dollars; and the "Last Days of Pompeii," 218 dollars; "The Star of Angled Banner," 257 dollars; and "Abon Hamean," for my benefit, on the 3d of June, 1837, only 175 dollars. Note: They did not kiss me this season—this accounts for the loss of the house!!!

Thus was the most brilliant season ever anticipated cut short, by a circumstance which could neither be foreseen or prevented, in which I had the slightest agency; but, like many more, finally engulfed in ruin, without even sympathy, while the banks were legalised, or galvanised. They suffered to proceed with their business, without interruption—no charter was forfeited.

This season, with the disasters of the last eighteen nights, produced ten thousand four hundred and forty-six dollars, making an average of 238 dollars and 46 cents per night; but one time the average was 300 dollars, and a prospect of continuance; but I had only the beginning of Philadelphia. The prospect of a season which would require sacrifice, which, having so lately escaped, was difficult of building the Pennsylvania Theatre, I was not prepared to meet.

To prepare for the continuance of my season, so as to avoid, if possible, the loss which every body anticipated, the opening of the New Circus, Russell Smith had been preparing the "Vision of the Sun," with which were to have opened; but delay—excitement out of doors—always apathy within—the piece was not ready at the end of June. So I opened the Walnut Street Theatre on the 17th, persuading Connor to attempt Richard the Third!!!

Shade of Shakespeare, forgive me! He did it—and did it brown." The pit boys were vociferous in their applause; and he has played it on one or two occasions since, when, I thank my lucky stars, I was not present. For "Thalaba," or "Lafitte," I want no better or more efficient man; but the idea of Cenner, as a tragedian—don't let me pursue it. On the 19th, Mrs. Henry Lewis, an actress of the Cobourg school, but a good one, and one whose value I appreciate, opened in Bianca, in "Fazio." On the following evening, she played Matilda, in the "French Spy;" she also played Richard the Third, Virginia, and Othello; and to say how the audience liked her, is only to say, she had 472 dollars on her night, notwithstanding the thermometer was ranging at 82°, a pretty good proof of success.

"The Vision of the Sun" had been looked for and expected, as the opening piece: the scenery, machinery, &c., could not be excelled. But the disappointment—always throwing cold water upon any piece—showed me the receipts of one ~~evening~~ fifty-four dollars, as the first return of a piece, the scene of which cost nearly three times the money. The second night—Saturday night, see, was twenty dollars worse. On the 23d July, it went to 356 dollars, and the following night ~~it~~ it. It was played altogether ten nights, two of which, the 4th of July and the 18th—the night the Pennsylvania was launched—produced 1009 dollars 75 ~~cents~~. Any other piece would have possibly produced more on these two holiday gala nights; and the other eight nights, collectively, yielded 961 dollars 25 cents. A heavy blow to the treasury. "Damn the Banks"—all caused by the banks. This was the general cry, and why not join it: for, seriously, they deserved a little harder treatment than harsh words.

Monday, the 10th of June, introduced to the Philadelphia audience one of the most astonishing men that ever trod the stage, whose fame was made by and expired with Tom and Jerry.

Mr. Walbourne was the original Dusty Bob; and Pierce Egan, in his "Life of an Actor," classes his performance of this part, as giving him a title in the niche of fame beside John Kemble, Mrs. Siddons, and all the great actors contained in his "Catalogue of Parts Acted"—which can never be forgotten by those who witnessed them. Here is the note, page 14:—"Mr. Walbourne's personation of Dusty Bob has been unanimously decided by the public, as one of, if not the greatest triumph of the histrionic art ever exhibited upon the stage." Kean, the first tragedian of the day, with the utmost liberality, gave it as his opinion that, during the whole course of his theatrical career, he had never seen any performance equal to it. Murden, a comic actor of great celebrity, exclaimed—"Good heavens! is it possible—do not my eyes deceive me! Most certainly, it is a real darsman [redacted] have [redacted] upon the stage. I am very sorry the profession has descended as low as to be compelled to resort to the streets to procure a person of that description, to maintain the [redacted]. He left the house in disgust—nor was it until introduced to Mr. Walbourne, behind the scenes, that he would believe [redacted] was an actor. Further praise than this is superfluous.

Booth played a few nights, [redacted] J. K. Booth, Henry G. Pearson, formerly of Philadelphia, now of the New Orleans Theatre, also played with Scott; but his acting appeared to the audience an attempt at burlesque. If such was his motive, he was most successful; [redacted] his reason for such a course seems mysterious—very.

On the 13th, I opened in Pittsburgh, with the Walnut Street company, with "Damon and Pythias," and the "Agreeable Surprise." On the 18th of September, Mr. Connor resigned his situation, because I would not take Mr. Proctor out of the part of Gaulantus, which he had played in Philadelphia—quoted precedents never heard of, and, if allowed, only proving him to be wrong in the construction placed upon them by the usages of all well regulated theatres. I endeavoured to combat this folly in vain; he was obstinately bent upon carrying a point which, in the relative position of the two actors, would have been unjust to Mr. Proctor in every sense. I had taken no part in the foolish quarrel, which had driven people from the theatre in disgust; hissing and applauding both of them every night; and I resolved I would not now interfere. To Mr. Connor I had resigned my position in the theatre as an actor, permitting him to play all the light comedy, as well as the leading melo-drama. He had become a great favourite; and at the very time his services were most needed, he thought proper to withdraw, which he did, at the close of the season. Mrs. Lewis, the Ravel family, (with Gabriel,) the Ninth Wonder of the World, Master Moor, Mr. Marble, and Master Burke, were the stars of the season, which closed on the 4th of November, 1837; when they paid me their usual compliment of hissing, which they neglected last season, and gave me 375 dollars for my benefit. There was nothing heard but—how bad the company is—nothing to compare to last season; until, one Sunday afternoon, when the subject was being discussed, I asked for a sheet of paper, recapitulated all the names, and, to the utter confusion of the grumblers, proved that they had only lost Mr. and Mrs. Green, and had acquired Mr. and Mrs. Herbert, Mr. and Mrs. Moor, and Mr. and Mrs. Kent. To their being caught in this trap, I owed the exertion they made for my benefit night; for Pittsburgh was labouring under frightful pecuniary difficulty, from the ruinous rate of exchange, and almost total absence of specie funds in their business transactions. Notwithstanding this general depression, in seven weeks and a half I took 10,604 dollars—an average of 236 dollars per night. It is true I paid to the Ravel Family their own terms, and the other stars received a considerable portion of the money; but I here wish to draw a comparison, being forty-six nights in Pittsburgh, and the same number of nights in Philadelphia, the Walnut Street Theatre having been closed during the time the company were in Pittsburgh; 7,940 dollars—an average of 172 dollars 60 cents; a difference in favour of the small city over the large one of 57 dollars 40 cents per night, notwithstanding Booth, Rice, (Jim Crow), Marble, Connor, Murdoch, and Scott, and a new scenic piece; and, strange as it may appear, Booth's benefit yielded 475 dollars 75 cents, and my own, the following night, 483 dollars 25 cents—equal to 969 dollars, in two nights, or one-eighth part of the whole amount of the forty-six nights' receipts!! This was generally the case; the money made in Pittsburgh was lost in the Walnut Street Theatre; whose doors must have closed but for the timely aid received, in cash, from my western friends; yet it is but justice to state, that the expenditure for producing pieces, in the regular course of business, was charged to the account of the Walnut Street Theatre—the Pittsburgh Theatre receiving the advantage of the scenery and properties, also dramas; and, most of all, the travelling reputation of such pieces as "Zanthe," "Thalaba," "Norman Leslie," &c., &c. For many seasons, Pittsburgh was a source of profit and pleasure; but when the tide did turn, I must show a different statement for forty-six nights. Locked in by ice on the Ohio, Alleghany, and Monongahela rivers, shut out by snow upon the mountains, 2,308 dollars was all that was received during forty-six nights of a season, at the doors of the Pittsburgh Theatre! Unfortunately, the managers did not return the compliment of a cash remittance, to make good the deficiency; the season in Philadelphia being almost equally disastrous during the severity of this more than usually severe winter of 1839-1840.

The Chestnut Street Theatre opened, for the fall season, on the 20th of August; Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Brantoo, Mr. Lindsey, Mrs. Bredt, and Mrs. Morgan, were engaged to the regular company; with Power, Mr. and Mrs. Keeley, Ellen Tree, Madame Celeste, Miss Phillips, James Wallack, Downton, and Gabriel Ravel, with a French troupe.

Mr. Harrison visited the Chestnut Street Theatre, to witness Power's first appearance for the season, in the "Irish

On the 14th of October, Power's engagement closed; the actor more popular and as attractive as ever: and on the following evening appeared, the former as Peter Spyke in a "Loan of a Lover," as Lucille in a drama of Gertrude in the farce. Little Ben Keeley, and his wife, (Miss Goward,) a pair of turtle doves worth saging. He was not the only one who owes his first approach to fame to "Tom and Jerry." His admirable performance of Jammy Green was one of the triumphs of the piece; quickly bringing the representative before the audience, he possessed more genius than heretofore conceded by the public. He was transplanted to the English Opera House, where he became a universal favourite. Mrs. Keeley was received nightly with smiling faces, and applauding hands, as the sourette, worthy of a place by the side of Miss Fanny Kelly, imparting such a vigour of colouring to every part she undertook, as to win the hearts of all, both male and female. The popularity of the Keeleys in London induced the offer, which for a time placed them before an American audience; where, if in a general point of view they were benefited largely as they should have been, they have left a reputation which, should they again visit the United States, will make them profitable stars a manager can engage. Unfortunately, it was not until they were on the point of leaving the audience began to appreciate their value, and utter much regret that they had not availed themselves of the opportunity offered, to witness the performance of the artists, who have returned to England with very high ideas of the judgment of our citizens in theatrical matters. They continued to perform during their first engagement in Philadelphia, until the 29th of October, when they were engaged by Mr. James Wallack and Miss Clifton.

Bowery Theatre in New York having been burnt down after the second performance of "Lucille," on the 23rd of September, a dramatic festival took place within the National Theatre, (Thomas Flinn, the manager,) as a benefit to Mr. Thomas Hamilton: and no one better deserved a compliment, for his integrity in all his transactions; the evening of November 1st night selected—the volunteers on the occasion, Power, Downton, Hackett, George Barrett, Miss Clifton, Miss Watson, Celeste, Hamblin, and Miss Charlotte Cushman, who sang "The Open Sea;" three pieces—"Henry the Fourth," "Wept of the Wept-on-Wish," and "Three Weeks after Marriage."

On the 28th of November, Calisto produced "La Bayadere," under the title of "The Maid of Cashmere," which has retained its hold in the affections of the people from that date. On the 6th of December, Talfourd's play of "Ion" was first acted in America at the Walnut Street Theatre / Mrs. Ternan being the original representative in the United States. For the copy of the play I was indebted to Pierce Butler, Esq.

On the 17th of December, Calisto took another farewell benefit, (Query,—what number was this? I have lost count,) and on the 20th, the Ravel family, with the immortal Gabriel, commenced a career in Philadelphia, closing the year 1836 in a perfect blaze of theatrical success. The 1st of January, 1837, fell upon a Sunday, and the ~~same~~ ~~year~~ at Julia, in the "Hunchback,"

MISS ELLEN TREE:

an actress who does not impress her audience violently in her favour at first, but gradually increases in their estimation, until finally having obtained a place in their hearts, there she remains in defiance of their better judgment. She must pardon me if I do not entertain so great an opinion of her talent as many of my contemporaries: my admiration of her sister, Miss M. Tree, (Mrs. Bradshaw,) whose performance of Clari and Zaide, in the "Law of Java," placed her so high in my estimation as a tragic actress, that I forgot her fame as a singer in my eulogium upon her acting—may render me an unfair judge of her merit; her best points painfully bring to my recollection "the light of other days." I have never seen Miss Ellen Tree perform any part in the ~~range~~ range of ~~the~~ ~~the~~ sustains, that left such an impression upon my mind, as to make me desirous of witnessing it a second time. She came to the United States heralded as the best actress of the English stage, (yet strangely enough her great ~~name~~ fame in England was acquired after, and not previous, to her first visit to America,) which, being tacitly admitted, no critic was ungallant enough to analyse her claim; besides her charming affability in private life turned the heads of half the editors, who bit the other half, and thus she triumphantly acquired golden opinions everywhere. May she long continue to convert them into eagles! She acted during her first engagement, Julia, Rosalind, Lady Townley, Leticia Hardy, Mrs. Haller, Marianna, Beatrice, Juliet, Lady Teazle, Portia, Mrs. Oakley, Donna Violante, Juliana, Viola, Donna Olivia, Kate O'Brien, and Mary in the drama of "The Daughter." If variety be charming, surely here is enough to charm any one; few stars favour their visitors with such a list.

Mrs. Gibbs, formerly Miss Graddon, played for Walton's benefit, in "Cinderella," on the 25th of January, and Miss Grove, on the 26th, played Juliet. On the 14th of February, 1837, poor Rowbotham, one of the firm of Maywood and Co., died. He was one of my oldest theatrical friends: I induced him to cross the Atlantic, in 1827. Few actors have left behind them a name more universally respected. His loss will be severely felt in the Chestnut Street Theatre, as an able and strict drill sergeant.

The Arch Street opened on the 1st of May, 1837, with "Paul Pry" and the "May Queen." Power, James Wallack, Mr. and Mrs. Keely, Miss Ellen Tree, the Ravel Family, Miss Turpin, and Celeste, all played short engagements; the last named lady closing the theatre on the 8th of July, with another final leave of her American friends, written by a deaf and dumb poet, and presented to Celeste by General Morris, of the New York Mirror, as the play-bills politely informed us.

The Chestnut Street Theatre opened for the fall season, full of mystery. Not a star announced as engaged, but brilliantly lighted with gas on the 18th of August, 1837; the play, "Every one has his Fault" in which Mr. Harrington, one of the most sensible actors to be found among us, made his first appearance as Lord Norland, assuming a position which he has since remained in the United States. On the 29th, the August promised made its appearance: E. Forrest, Hackett, Rice, (Jim Crow,) Ellen Tree, Charles Horn, Bedouin Arabs, Miss Horton, Mr. Brough, and Mr. and Mrs. Wood.

To oppose this galaxy, was offered the horses, ponies, and equestrians of which opened on the 28th of August, 1837—the most perfect affair of the kind yet offered for support in Philadelphia; but as the Yankees never saw anything upon which their inventive genius could not improve, so the style so new to them was, before Cooke's departure, thrown entirely in the shade. He had opened the eyes of Welsh, Raymond, Bancker, and other equestrian managers, and discovered to them a mine of wealth, which they have been working successfully ever since. No foreign circus can ever again compete with them—so it should be; and their enterprise and energy deserve the success they have met. For a short period the circus was the rage, the fashion, the everything. It continued open until the 21st of December, when, followed by the good wishes of the community, Cooke, and the different members attached to his establishment, proceeded to Baltimore to reap fresh honours.

CIRCUS.

Miss Horton was the first star of the season at the Chestnut Street Theatre; she appeared on the 50th of

August. Hill, the best of all Yankee comedians was the next; then James Browne, a gentle comedian of the first rank; he played Bob Acres and Baron Frederick Willinghurst, on the 18th of September, inducing Mr. W. B. Wood to remark, that he belonged to the breed of actors that he feared was extinct—great praise, Mr. Browne, from such. I never saw a fault found with Mr. Browne's acting by any person in the city; but I do not recollect ever to have seen him play, except upon one occasion of some actor's benefit, in a tolerably filled house: indeed it was one beggarly account of empty boxes succeeding another, each night of his engagement—a striking proof that Philadelphia has receded from the high and honourable position once occupied, which she used to look up to her decision of their talent as the pass-word to success. Alas! the educated class of society rarely visit the doors of the theatre; and I fear the breed of audience, as well as the actors, is fast becoming extinct. In September, Mrs. Tree played a round of her favourite characters, and on the 2nd of October one of the extraordinary men belonging to the stage appeared at us—

This gentleman for many years enjoyed a high reputation as an actor, in Liverpool and Manchester. In an evil hour, to increase his fame, he accepted an engagement at the Garden Theatre, where he made his appearance as King Lear. He acted with much severity, but with less civility than the manager. The manager, disappointed in all expectations, tried every annoyance to induce him to abandon his contract. I remember seeing him in a very indifferent male-drama, founded upon Scott's novel of "Kenilworth," in which he acted the part of Leicester, the audience hissing him regularly as he left the stage. If this was a managerial device, it failed; he evidently set up his mind to receive, at least, the wages of his fall. His look of indignation plainly said, "Insult me if you please, I am defenceless; but I can't afford to relinquish my bond: the sovereigns I must have;" and he got them. A compromise took place; for a stated sum of money he agreed to leave the theatre. He returned to the country, hoping to receive from his former patrons sympathy and support. Here he was doomed to meet another disappointment. The fate of all unsuccessful aspirants for theatrical honour awaited him. During his absence Mr. Salter had so well supplied his place, that the audience would not permit the managers to discharge him, or to place him again in a second-rate position, to make an opening for their former favourite. The Montague and the Capulots of old never carried their funds to greater length; blood flowed, drawn by the [redacted] instead of the sword, of the opponents. In 1822, every [redacted] piece of wall in [redacted] bore an inscription: Never for ever—Vandenhoff for ever—No rejected Actors—giving the town an appearance of an election, during [redacted] discussion of [redacted] popular question. In Manchester, [redacted] [redacted] favourite, but in Liverpool the [redacted] were as decidedly in favour of Vandenhoff. The [redacted] [redacted] compelled [redacted] retain both the actors—at Liverpool Vandenhoff taking [redacted] lead, and in [redacted] Salter [redacted] [redacted] hero. After a [redacted] lapse of time, Vandenhoff returned to London, making [redacted] the Haymarket the scene of trial, [redacted] no [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] with [redacted] iron nerve of a man of genius, [redacted] [redacted] having been unfairly treated, he made [redacted] third attempt, and succeeded, being considered one of the best tragedians of the English stage—indeed we [redacted] class him [redacted] [redacted] Macready. Not having been announced at the commencement [redacted] the season, [redacted] appeared without the usual preparation [redacted] puff, puff, puff. As an actor of [redacted] declamation, [redacted] [redacted] unrivalled—his Cato, and [redacted] Adrastus in “Ion,” [redacted] [redacted] quoted as specimens of excellence. He made his first bow to a [redacted] [redacted] in Coriolanus, producing neither won- [redacted] nor displeasure. Mrs. Flynn supported [redacted] throughout [redacted] engagement. Jim Crow (T. Rice) was the [redacted] star. [redacted] traitor! the deserter! the black varmint!—what induced him [redacted] go [redacted] Chesham Street Theatre? Poor Gumbo Cuff! thy fame [redacted] gone—perished, thy [redacted] humour: converted [redacted] a Bond [redacted] dandy—Jim Crow turned [redacted]!! [redacted] [redacted] Theatre, a star of the [redacted] magnitude—on the [redacted] [redacted] Street, a thing to frighten [redacted] from the boxes. Mr. Rice found this secret out too late: after one good engagement—the [redacted] of [redacted] English fame,—he was consigned [redacted] [redacted] attraction, [redacted] almost anni- [redacted] popularity, [redacted] [redacted] minor theatres, [redacted] [redacted] never have left. [redacted] the new [redacted] he brought with him, were formed for [redacted] meridian of London: [redacted] genteel for American [redacted] and, consequently, troublesome only to the [redacted] and unproductive [redacted] the treasury. Rice’s excellent performance of Othello in the “Black Opera,” has redeemed his reputation. Why don’t [redacted] associate himself with Palma’s “Ethiopian Opera Company?” His splendid voice and [redacted] tact will [redacted] [redacted] him, under such an arrangement, another fortune.

On [redacted] 15th of December, a public [redacted] was [redacted] to Mr. [redacted] Forrest, by his fellow citizens of Philadelphia, for the able manner in which he had acquitted himself upon the London stage, claiming as an American, in the metropolis of the British empire, the right to be enrolled as an actor with their own Garrick, Keen, and Kemble. Nicholas Biddle, at this time a great man, (also! for human greatness; had he died before the suspension of specie payments by the banks, what a reputation had been his in the history of after ages,—now the finger of scorn is pointed at his memory, as a financial Charlatan, who, by his wild theory and speculation, ruined thousands of his countrymen ! ! !)—was announced to take the chair; but being prevented by sickness, his place was supplied by Chief Justice Gibson, supported by Judge Roger, Mayor Swift, Joseph B. Ingersoll, Morton M'Michael, Louis A. Godey, E. Holden, &c., &c., &c. Mr. E. Forrest, and his friend, Mr. Leggett, of New York, being duly introduced by the Committee, the good things provided for the occasion by mine host of the Merchants' Hotel, (Mr. Sanderson,) were dispatched with the usual celerity on such occasions, and the speeches, which were excellent, commenced. Mayor Swift's allusion to the first attempt of Forrest to act in public, under the [redacted] of the laughing gas, at the Tivoli Garden, in Market Street, caused a roar of laughter, in which no one joined more heartily than the tragedian himself. Forrest's speech [redacted] in the delivery too much of the Metamora style about it, but the matter was decidedly good; and although protesting that he was no actor here, (at the festive board,) yet he never acted so well in his life, as during this reply to the compliments profusely showered upon him.

When a public dinner is given in honour of a naval or a military hero, [redacted] professional brethren are [redacted] to [redacted] in [redacted] strength,—nothing BUT duty can induce them to absent themselves: the same "esprit de corps" governs statesmen, lawyers, and politicians; but a dinner to an actor, as the reward of literary services rendered to his country, was such an unusual event, that the novelty should have induced the attendance of every actor who respected his profession—their numbers should have spoken their feelings in this just cause of triumph to their art. In the days of Jefferson, Francis, Warren, and Burke, what a display would have graced this table; but while the bar, the press, and even the pulpit, were represented fully, the stage alone was numerically scant—W. B. Wood, Maywood, myself, E. S. Conner, Charles Porter, and Howard the vocalist, were the only members of the profession present. A deputation should have been there from the theatres of Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Washington, anxious to avail themselves of such an opportunity of proving that the stage was, [redacted] is, a profession that any man of learning might feel proud to embrace.

As a compliment to [redacted] E. Forrest, [redacted] was a flattering mark of the estimation in which his talent was held in his native city; but I should have preferred recording that he was to be found as the esteemed guest of those gentlemen who met here to do him honour at their private dwellings, giving to the actor a claim to the position of a gentleman, in the society of gentlemen, upon terms of admitted equality—respected and respecting. Is this for ever to be forbidden ground? It has been asserted, that the conduct of the foreign actors has been such as to close the doors of society against their admission; but gentlemen, in mercy, visit not these sins on the heads of your own countrymen. The time is fast approaching when all your actors will be Americans; give them, then, an inducement to elevate their profession—show them that the doors of society are thrown open to them, courting admission. You will find them then rational companions, eager to wipe out the stain of vagabondism unjustly stamped upon their brow for

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Opening of the American "The Destruction of" Introduction to Captain Marryatt. Destruction of Cook's Circus. Movement of Managers in his behalf. Pittsburgh again. Mr. Parsons, the actor and preacher. A Curious Letter. A Rabulicist Lady. Madam Augusta. Bad management of her husband. A Letter of E. Forrest's.

On the 15th of November, 1837, I opened the American Theatre in Philadelphia, with Booth as Hamlet, followed by the farce of "Welsh Girl;" receipts, $44. I hoped, by remaining in Pittsburgh, to have escaped the run of success which Cooke commanded with his New Circus; my company, too, had undergone a change not much for the better; Conner had left me for the Walnut Street Theatre. My force stood thus: James Anderson, stage manager, Messrs. Hadaway, Proctor, William Warren, O. Porter, Addams, Rice, Joseph Smith, Kent, Herbert, Vaché, Grierson, Percival, F. Myers, Wemyss, Wilks, Jackson, Mo Conachy, J. Van Stavernen, Crona, and Bannister; Mesdames Kent, Proctor (Willis,) Bannister, Herbert, Wilks; Misses Warren, Price, O. Price, Packard, White, and Ruth.

On Monday, the 20th of November, Bannister's play of the "Destruction of Jerusalem," nicknamed the "Destruction of the Walnut Street Theatre," was produced; the scenery, by Russel Smith, was grand and imposing; the temple of Solomon, and the market-place of Jerusalem, with the last scene, an exact copy of Martin's picture of Satan in Council, surpassed anything I had seen for effect. Unfortunately, I made ~~him~~ an angel of light; had I represented a devil, with horns, hoof, ~~and~~ tail, the piece ~~might~~ have succeeded; ~~but~~ ~~and~~ cry was ~~that~~ that it ~~was~~ the spirit of truth and not the spirit of evil ~~that~~ raised. This proved fatal; profanity, sacrilege, contempt of religion, and a catalogue of ~~other~~ heard-of crimes were laid to my charge. The Press thoughtlessly joined the foolish cry; and after the sixth night, the piece ~~was~~ withdrawn—yielding, in six nights, 1181 dollars ~~and~~ pay 2700 dollars, a loss, ~~in~~ the second week of the season, 1530 dollars. On the following Monday, by hard labour, a new drama, ~~the~~ "Demon of ~~the~~ Desert," was produced—~~failed~~. ~~My~~ Booth ~~was~~ ~~for~~, arrived on the 11th of December, and played Richard—he also failed. By ~~his~~ six nights engagement I ~~received~~ ~~the~~ dollars, a very pretty beginning ~~for~~. ~~He~~ played three nights—worse and worse; the receipts of the engagement, including ~~the~~ benefit of which he ~~received~~ half, amounted to only ~~the~~ dollars. Christmas night, another ~~piece~~, ~~the~~ dollars; but "Thruza" ~~was~~ more ~~successful~~ than ~~his~~ predecessor. A host of benefits followed, most of ~~which~~ ~~lost~~ ~~the~~ ~~gits~~—Proctor's ~~the~~ Mrs. Kent's ~~the~~ only profit. ~~I~~ ~~now~~ ~~Porter~~ the giant, ~~the~~ Major Stephens ~~the~~ dwarf—no use. On the ~~the~~ night of the season ~~the~~. ~~My~~ "Scotch Clave ~~the~~ ~~the~~ Chieftains," in ~~the~~ Mr. ~~the~~ stage arrangements were admirable; ~~the~~ the 23d ~~of~~ January fixed their doom. Nothing could succeed; ~~the~~ "Destruction of Jerusalem" had, indeed, spread a blight upon the theatre; 30 dollars, ~~the~~ dollars, and 50 dollar houses were more frequent than agreeable spectacles. The first glimpse of success was my complimentary benefit, the arrangements for ~~the~~ having ~~been~~ completed on the ~~the~~ of February, I ~~the~~ pleasure ~~in~~ seeing 1,084 ~~the~~ in the house—the pieces being ~~the~~ "School for Scandal," and "State Secrets." ~~the~~ on the occasion were W. B. Wood, ~~the~~ C. Maywood, E. E. Conner, Mary Anne Lee, James Howard, W. C. Brongh, W. ~~the~~ Burton, Thomas Faulkner, H. G. Allen, George Taylor, ~~the~~ Hamilton, Mr. Walton, and Mr. Pearson. On this ~~the~~ I had ~~the~~ pleasure of an introduction to Captain Marryath, who, be ~~the~~ what they may, ~~the~~ an excellent companion. Who brought him behind the scenes I do not know, but he ~~the~~ ~~was~~ leave the back of the house ~~the~~ straight ~~the~~ he entered, sundry glasses of champagne having elevated him ~~the~~ a ~~the~~ happy forgetfulness for ~~the~~ time being. This seasonable relief ~~the~~ ~~the~~ of the treasury, although not ~~the~~ large ~~the~~ I and my friends ~~the~~ calculated upon, was ~~the~~ serviceable.

On the ~~the~~ February, a most appalling calamity took place in Baltimore, the destruction, by fire, of Cooke's Amphitheatre, ~~the~~ all ~~the~~ splendid stand ~~the~~ forty horses—not one aged! In twelve hours reduced, from comparative wealth, to want and misery in a foreign country. A meeting of the _____ was held _____ his favour, _____ resolutions passed to open _____ of subscription _____ his behalf; to apply for the _____ of the Holiday Theatre for a benefit—prices of tickets _____ 2 _____ each; _____ a circular to be addressed to managers _____ _____ different theatres, to co-operate in _____ for his relief.

Managers needed _____ prompting to such a deed. Before the resolutions _____ passed, Mr. Cooke was in possession of a letter from _____ placing the Walnut Street Theatre _____ disposal _____ any night he chose to name, without reference _____ _____ engagements, which I undertook to regulate, _____ _____ they _____ _____ interfere with any action for his immediate relief.

Hamblin, of New York, presented him _____ with _____ original theatrical horse, Mazeppa; which _____ _____ _____ splendid horses; so that the great burnt-out was shortly _____ _____ again, and able to open _____ _____ _____ Philadelphia, _____ the _____ of March. He _____ little _____ _____ _____ encouragement; _____ the benefit at his own theatre was a failure. Oh, Philadelphia, this _____ not thy usual mode of treating misfortune!—where the sufferer, too, _____ admitted _____ _____ hands to be worthy of thy sympathy.

_____ to my letter, I received the following:

“February _____ _____”

“MY DEAR FRIEND,

“I am requested by Mr. Cook to say that the anguish of his mind, _____ bodily illness, have jointly _____ the cause of his delay in answering your kind and welcome letter.

“Mr. Cooke accepts your offer, and _____ be happy to _____ when _____ night is appointed. If “Monsieur Tonsou” _____ give you no _____ trouble, I will _____ over and act Monsieur Mortieu, as I have _____ appeared _____ Philadelphia. Mr Cooke acknowledges your _____ _____ gratefully, as _____ _____ manager who has stepped forward, and will always acknowledge _____ real obligation. _____ kind enough to reply as early as possible, and probably I shall set off on the receipt of your answer, to make whatever interest I can among Mr. Cooke’s friends.

“I am, for poor Cooke,

“Your very obedient servant,

(Signed) “J. W. _____”

“P. _____ Address _____ Thomas Cooke, Gay Street, Baltimore.

“To _____ C. Wemyss, Esq.,

“Walnut _____ Theatre, Philadelphia.”

_____ benefit took place _____ the Walnut _____ Theatre, _____ the _____ _____ February, (Wednesday). “The _____ of Molotiers,” _____ _____ Cline, and “the Weathercock:” receipts 660 dollars, 25 cents. Mr. and Mrs. George Jones acted three nights, and Booth once more—three nights, 184 dollars, 56 dollars, _____ dollars. Oh dear! oh dear! "Battle of Poliers," produced in lavish style, by Barrymore, with the ceremony of the Installation of the Knights of the Garter, on the 19th of February. A more horrible failure than any thing yet! Mrs. Barrymore, four nights, only 220 dollars; and on the 21st of March I brought this ruinous season to a close, with the "Poor Gentleman," and "Sam Slick," for my benefit—279 dollars. Oh what a house.

Never did I turn my face towards my Pittsburgh friends with an joyful a heart, as I stepped into the stage, on the 26th day of March, to commence my spring season, which opened on the 31st of March, 1838, with "Faith and Falshood," and "The Secret;" house, 253 dollars. Monday, 2nd of April, 239 dollars—manager and actors elated by the view of full houses. Nothing raises the spirits of an army so much as a sudden victory. In the midst of gloom and defeat, the same result followed in the theatre. The actors seemed to have acquired new energy; and for eleven weeks, good humour, good houses, and good living made every one happy and contented. The benefits this season were all good. In this the citizens of Pittsburgh evinced good judgment. Nothing makes a clever actor more desirous of returning to a city than this attention to his interest on the night of his benefit. I wish the example was followed elsewhere. My good friends of Philadelphia, adopt this, even if it does proceed from the West of the mountains; the talent of your stock actors will be materially improved by it. On the 19th of April, Mrs. Watson played Diana Vernon, in "Rob Roy," and treated the citizens of Pittsburgh, for the first time, to an opera: playing "The Barber of Seville," on the 16th, to a house of 545 dollars. Dr. Valentine was the next star: but his eccentricities did not seem to meet the expectations of his auditors. On the 7th of May, Mr. Parsons commenced an engagement: this gentleman was a favourite—but, on the following season, provoked the wrath of the Pittsburghers, by a very foolish speech, which they resented, by throwing a portion of one of the benches at his head. If I, as the manager of the theatre, could laugh at their fun, and turn the practice of hiving me at the end of each season, into a good-humoured joke, perfectly understood between the audience and myself, surely he, as my representative, should have possessed more sense than to notice as an insult what was intended as "a lark"—a foolish one if you please, but not a justification for the impertinent speech he thought proper to address to them, and which they so promptly resented. Mr. Parsons is now engaged in preaching the Holy Gospel, and has learnt, I hope, that soft words frequently turn away evil designs. May his ministry be as successful as his stowage. p did to me, as his earthly one—and, above all, let him remember he cannot serve God and Mammon !!!

Here is a letter from a gentleman studying theology, with a view to being ordained a minister :—

(COPY.)

"MY DEAR WARREN:—Mrs. Shaw's engagement, no go. First night, 103 dollars; second night, "Lady Lyons," 100 dollars; third night, "Ion," 80 dollars. What do you think of that? 100 place in Pittsburgh is not worth the attentions of any manager. I am disgusted with it, and again in my professional character, will I visit it. A monkey show, 10 a day a head, is equal to their concerts, and fully adapted to the intellectuality—more is beyond my conception; blast them. I am altogether sick of the ways of management, if such is to be my success, and I think you are with me too. Therefore, if I was not already engaged to you, for Baltimore, I should, I think, decline the matter; as it is, I will do all I can to make things go right.

"Please write me by return, and give such instructions as you think proper.

"Yours truly,

"PITTSBURGH, Nov. 26, 1838."

(Signed,)

"C. B. PARSONS."

On the 18th of May, 1838, Balwer's play of the "Lady Lyons" was acted, for the first time in the United States, at Pittsburgh—for my benefit! Mrs. Proctor (Mrs. Willis, Miss Warren) was the Pauline, and Binnister the Claude Melnotte. Jim Crow Rice was the last star of the season, which closed on the 16th of June, 1838, with Mrs. Kent's benefit, "The Rent Day," and "The Pet of the Petticoats,"—amounting to 1000 dollars. I returned to Philadelphia and opened the American Theatre in Walnut Street, on the 23d of June, 1838, commencing a season which lasted for three months and eighty-five consecutive nights, or sixty-four weeks and one night, unprecedented in the annals of theatricals—once more rising to the height of popular favour as a manager. Oh, fleeting fame! how evanescent! The "Comedy of Errors" and "Jim Crow in London"—the houses very full indeed.

On the 10th of August, in face of remonstrances from my quarters, I produced a pageant, entitled "the Coronation of Queen Victoria"—it was successful. I followed, as nearly as I could recollect, the arrangement of Elliston's grand spectacle of the "Coronation of George Fourth," refreshing my memory from the London newspapers, which were filled with the details of the coronation of Britain's youthful queen. It taught the audiences once more the road to the Walnut Street Theatre, which they appeared to have forgotten; yet, Mrs. Bannister's (Mrs. Stone's) republican feelings were so much annoyed, that she so far forgot her position to the manager and the audience, as to hiss the last verse of God save the Queen for several nights, inducing a few in front of the theatre to follow her example—rather an hazardous experiment, and perfectly uncalled-for. Her livelihood depended upon the success of the theatre which she thus tried to embarrass.

On the 24th of September,

████████ AUGUSTA

appeared to a house of 877 dollars, ██████ ladies, wherever a seat could be obtained. She was young, handsome, and possessed talent of the first order in her profession. The announcement of La Bayadera, under such circumstances, was an excitement which the folly and stupidity of Mr. St. James overturned. He engaged to furnish the services of his wife, (Mrs. Bailey,) as Ninka; Mr. Bishop, as the Unknown; and Mr. Archer, as Olifour, with twelve ladies as a corps de ballet. He arrived in Philadelphia with Mrs. Philips, in the place of Mrs. Bailey; as Olifour; and Mr. Horncastle, lent by Mr. Wallack, for one night, from the National Theatre in New York. Mr. Pickering, at the last moment, stepped forward and read the part of Olifour, from the score: but for this act of kindness, the audience must have been dismissed; yet Mr. St. James never offered him the slightest compensation. Horncastle being compelled to return to New York, ██████ Augusta was announced in Three Dances; the engagement destroyed; for La Soumambula, as a ballet, did not prove acceptable in face of such a disappointment.

On the 19th of September, I received from Mr. Forrest the following letter, in answer to a question, why he was not announced as engaged at the Chestnut Street Theatre? where they had been so anxious to secure his services a few months before, when he so misled me as to his ██████

"MY DEAR WYTHE:—A press of business prevented my answering your letter yesterday.

"As to J. R. Scott, I have a rule which forbids my playing for any benefit but the benefit of the Theatrical Fund." I shall be most happy to pay him, out of my own purse, fifty dollars a week during the engagement, and I have no doubt that a likewise paid by you, would secure his services.

"In answer to your question, why I have not performed at the Park Theatre, listen—Mr. Price, to suit his own purposes, chose to infer that I would quit the profession this year, and so engaged the best of the season to foreigners, and to the exclusion of all native ██████ I always take pleasure in welcoming to our shores any exotic talent; but certainly not to the entire exclusion of that which is native and to the manner born."

"I went to the National Theatre, where I was offered my own time.

"As for Maywood, he did not offer me an engagement, of course, as you must be aware that arrangements of the Chestnut Street Theatre are made to subservience to the wishes expressed or implied of the Park manager. Perhaps, however, his anti-republican principles were so shocked at my consenting to deliver a fourth of July Oration before the democracy of New York, that he determined to punish me for my offence, by excluding me from the Chestnut Street Theatre. But whatever motives operated with him or others, thanks to the "real people," I have, so far, been going on swimmingly.

"Last night, my benefit was between 1400 and 1500 dollars.

"Yours sincerely,

"New York, Sep. 18, 1838. (Signed,) "EDWIN FORREST."

XXXIV.

Return of Forrest to the Walnut Street. "Amilia." The Front Street Theatre and Circus in Baltimore. A losing Concern. Parsons studying Theology.

On the 25th of October, E. Forrest returned to the theatre, where he first received those exorbitant terms which swelled his fortunes; and the patrons of which he had displeased, by breaking a pledge made by himself—unsolicited by the audience—that so long as the doors of this theatre (the Walnut Street,) were open to him, he wanted no other home, &c., &c. (See his address in 1829, at the close of his engagement with Ainslee and Blake.) We have him here again, and so let by-gones be by-gones. He played Othello in a masterly style, to 873 dollars; Damon, to 515 dollars; Claude Melnotte, to 558 dollars; Macbeth to 379 dollars; Metamora to 554 dollars; Metamora to 708 dollars! and Claude Melnotte and William Tell, for his benefit, to 863 dollars. As the price of admission was only fifty cents to the boxes, and twenty-five cents to the pit, I may assert that more persons visited the theatre during this engagement, than on any previous occasion for the same length of time. He repeated Metamora on Tuesday, the 28rd, to 418 dollars; Gladiator, 589 dollars; Claude Melnotte, 375 dollars; Gladiator, 477 dollars; Richard III., 428 dollars; Gladiator and Carwin, for benefit, 851 dollars.

So determined was he at this time, in his opposition to Maywood, that when I laughingly proposed to cut him out of "Amilia," if I could get the words, he turned jest into earnest, by stating he knew Simpson had it; and if I would really do it, he would undertake to get it from the Park Theatre. Done, and it was done—well done, on the 19th of November, in eighteen days from the time of this conversa-

Forrest left Philadelphia for New York, on the 1st of October; on the 31st, I received this letter—

My Dear Wences :-Shopsen has promised me the words, music, &c., complete, of the opera of "Amilie," with this provision, that I pledge myself that what he lends shall not be copied, or used in such a way, that any other person may appropriate it to its use. I have pledged myself to this, and I expect some pledge from you. Mr. Brough will be the bearer of "Amilie" to you.

"New York, November 22, 1833. (Signed,) F. Forrest."

This was indeed, quick work. Brough returned to New York to Bishop and Mrs. Charles H. ; but with little understanding about terms with this lady, whose husband was a very different thing, and another, nearly overturned the arrangement. I proceeded to New York, and in obtaining Bishop and Otto, engaged several singers, and returning, commenced active preparations. The Theatre presented the appearance of a large academy of music—every room had a piano going; Mr. Taylor, Mr. B. Cross, Mr. Allen, Bishop, and the chorus, were in the morning, and in the afternoon every day, Brough and Madame Otto, with Bishop, acquired their parts: the painting was all activity, the wardrobe presented a lively scene at eleven o'clock, on Monday night, 19th November, I had the satisfaction to hear the curtain descend upon the finale, followed by cheers, and such applause as rewards a manager for past labour, by the knowledge that the receipts of his treasury will be increased. Congratulations poured in from all quarters; for twelve nights "Amilie" retained triumphant possession of the stage, and was reluctantly laid aside, to make way for the second engagement of Mr. Forrest, which, by contract, commenced on the 3rd of December. Bishop, as the Chamois Hunter, established himself as a tenor singer of taste and judgment; the broken English of Madame Otto threw a peculiar charm around the part of Amilie, while Brough did his best to aid the efforts of the other two: the chorus was excellent; and, the great object effected, the charm of novelty was gone, and the love-spell which had captivated the city of New York captive so long, was broken before it was heard from the lips of Wilson, Segula, and Miss Sherwin, in the city of Philadelphia.

The Fifth Street Theatre and Circus, in Baltimore, having sprung, phoenix-like, from its ashes, was undertaken to rebuild it for Cooke, whose misfortunes had induced him to return to England, the lease was offered to me; and on the 3rd of December, 1833, one of the most beautiful theatres in the United States, erected by Minifie, was opened to the public, with a large dramatic, as well as equestrian corps; the latter under the direction of S. Nichols,—the pieces of "Loan of a lover," equestrian exercises, and the farce of "Raising the Wind"—amount of horses, $26 dollars; the company, Mr. Parsons, Mr. J. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. H. Eberle, Mr. and Mrs. Howe, Mr. Russell, Mr. Winans, Mr. Peorval, Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, Mrs. Proctor, Mrs. A. Knight, Mrs. Cramer, Plumer, Mr. Collins, Mr. and Mrs. Jackson, Mr. Vansteyren, Mr. Woodbury, Mrs. Groves, Mr. Barry, Mr. and Mrs. Procter, Joe Murphy, and a strong corps de ballet; the equestrians, J. Aymar, Whittaker, Nichols, Knap, Howe, Andreas and Son, Miss Nicholas, Mr. and Mrs. Cole, R. Myers, Lipman, Mr. Woolford, ring-master, and a corps of Lilliputian dancers, under the direction of Amherst; Gowin, and Mr. and Mrs. Gardner, were engaged, but did not come. My nightly expenses were three hundred and twenty-eight dollars; the consequence was, in nine weeks I lost 2,768 dollars: the whole equestrian department, horses and riders, were a dead weight upon the stage performance; the "Bronze Horse," for ten nights averaged 400 dollars, I despatched the horses to Philadelphia, and endeavoured to retrieve losses by a succession of show pieces. Parsons who was the acting and stage manager, at a salary of fifty dollars per week, was studying theology in the theatre; neglecting the business, and caring about nothing but receiving his money from the treasury in which he was, punctually personified; I gladly cancelled his engagement, and have never met him since. In the pulpit his labours may be more successful; but from his career—his sudden return to the stage—I fear the love of notoriety, not religion, is the guiding principle.

I ought to have known Baltimore better; but I thought a dash, with everything of the best around me, would have made at least one brilliant season. It was a fatal error: had I confined my efforts to the stage alone, and followed that season by a circus, without dramatic performance, I should have hit the right nail upon the head. At the end of a season of one hundred and twenty-one nights, they made me a benefit of 761 dollars, for which they have my thanks; although they would not come to see Burton, Bell, J. Sefton, Marble, Wood and his dogs, Emma Ince, and Mary Ann Lee.

On the 3rd of December, at the American, in Philadelphia, Forrest, Oxley, and Mrs. Shaw, played seven nights, yielding to Mr. Forrest 1,467 dollars but to the treasury of the theatre—nothing! deducting the amount paid for the services of Oxley and Mrs. Shaw. Mr. Forrest's second engagement entailed a loss upon the theatre.

On the 9th of February, Nichols and his horses, from Baltimore, commenced an engagement with the "Forty Thieves;" and if in the Front Street Theatre they had proved a most unprofitable speculation, at the Walnut Street Theatre, for seven weeks, they continued to draw good houses, not only retrieving all losses, but leaving a surplus in the treasury. This season was one of singular changes: commencing on the 23rd of June, 1838, the middle of October found a deficiency of five thousand dollars; on the 20th of [redacted] found the whole [redacted] retrieved, and a continued gain to the [redacted] of the season, on the three hundred and eighty-fifth night, the 14th of September, 1839; the best, and, in fact, the only [redacted] I ever had in the Walnut Street Theatre, which [redacted] the sink [redacted] swallowed [redacted] the gains of Pittsburgh, and continually [redacted] more, more! The equestrian drama produced, was "Forty Thieves," "El Hyder," "Timour [redacted] Tartar," "Ostaract [redacted] the Ganges," "Lodolaka," "Blue Beard," and the "Tiger [redacted]." During this engagement, my master-carpenter, James Landers, left me to build the stage of the new Bowery Theatre; [redacted] was a loss, indeed; he is [redacted] best theatrical carpenter and machinist in the United [redacted].

The Pittsburgh Theatre, this spring, opened on [redacted] May, 1839, with "Laugh when You Can," [redacted] "Raphael," Balls playing Gossamer. The citizens of Pittsburgh almost killed him with kindness out of [redacted] theatre, if they did not answer his expectations behind the curtain; his head was not hard enough to attempt the game he nearly fell a martyr to; to see a Pittsburgh bon vivant under the table, is a task few attempt who know them, and fewer succeed in accomplishing. My friend Balls was a child at this game, [redacted] they laughed at [redacted] his folly, until [redacted] of mania-a-potu turned a joke [redacted] earnest, and [redacted] parties withdrew from [redacted] contest, equally [redacted] of having participated in [redacted].

[redacted] May, [redacted] Rodeniu Arabs [redacted] natives, while Miss Mason, [redacted] and Mrs. Sloman, John Sefton, [redacted] Forrest, kept up the ball [redacted] successfully; [redacted] closing on the 29th of June, with "A Lesson for Ladies," and "Cramond Brig," for my benefit; a little hiving, as usual, and a splendid bottle of Champagne to wash it down afterwards: this [redacted] my last visit professionally to Pittsburgh. Mr. Parsons superintended the following season, and Mr. Jackson finished the game, in 1840, with a loss of four thousand dollars in seventy two nights, the greater portion of which, unfortunately, remained unpaid.

XXXV.

The Walnut Street Theatre to Cooke. Opening of the Chestnut Street Theatre.
A Galaxy of Names. Madame Vestris. Mr. Legrand. Miss Sheriff.

On the 1st of April, 1838, by permission of the Board of the Walnut Street Theatre to Cooke, the property of the theatre was sold, and the theatre, twelve months sooner, would have been worth the same. A year ago, you, prevented the building of the Circus, and saved your tenant from ruin. Now it is a ruin of the theatre, yielded by you for the sake of the theatre from the bar, the theatre being closed at the time. The production "Mazeppa," in splendid style, followed it. "Napoleon," as well done by Barrymore, which failed; and on the 1st of April, the "Cataract of the Ganges" sharing a similar fate, closed his doors on the 25th of May, never to open them again in America; returned to his native country with blighted prospects and ruined fortune, to commence a new career at a time when age should have been in comfortable retirement. He left behind him a reputation, and with whom the slightest business transactions, may attend his future movements.

On the 1st of April, Mr. Vandenoef appeared as Cato. A piece entitled "Sam Weller," from the Pickwick Papers, which have been very successful at the Chestnut Street Theatre, an unusual occurrence there with the style of the literature. On the 1st of June, Conner played the Third, how many spectators is not recorded; on the 26th, W. Wood claimed the honour of being the representative in Philadelphia of Claude Melnotte, in "The Lady of Lyons,"—sixty won't do for twenty-six years of age! Why did he not try Col. Darnley?

On the 1st of August, 1838, the Chestnut Street Theatre announced to open with a host upon the stage of various names; but one damper to the whole—the prices were again raised, of course to be again lowered. The names of the cast: Mrs. Matthews, late Madame Vestris; Miss Sheriff, Miss Celeste, Mademoiselle Stephen, and a corps of ballet Tyrone Power, Charles Matthews, Wilson, Seguin, Mona, Hazard, Bedouin Arabs, James Wallace, and Hackett. The pieces on the first night, "Wives as they Were, and as they are," "The Ladies' Man," a very good comedy.

The 8th of August brought before us

MISS VESTRIS, (Mrs. CHARLES MATTHEWS.)

who appeared as Gertrude, in "The Loan of a Lover," and Julia, in "One Hour, or the Carnival Ball." Without entering into any defence of the faults of Mrs. Charles Matthews, to her the American theatres are indebted for the improvement so apparent in the arrangement of the stage, carpets, ottoman's, grates, fenders, centre-tables, &c., in drawing-rooms; gravel-walks, beds of flowers, hot-house plants, in gardens, are all her work. Among the number of ladies who have attempted the difficult task of managing a theatre, she alone has succeeded. Look at the perfect manner in which the light pieces were produced at the Olympic Theatre, in London. Every thing requisite to complete the illusion of the scene was there—and she insisted, as a "sine qua non" with the American managers, that they should be here also. For this alone she deserves the gratitude as well as admiration of every visitor of the play-house. As an actress in the varied extent of the drama, she has no superior: and any auditor who could listen unmoved to her "Olivia," in "The Barrack Room," may for ever renounce all claim to taste or judgment in theatrical matters. The prejudice excited against her by an unfortunate expression, said to have been uttered by her at Saratoga, prevented her from receiving an impartial hearing at the hands of an American audience; her engagement was a failure both in money and reputation. But this is not to be attributed to want of talent in her profession. The absurd cry that she was no actress, and unworthy of the reputation she enjoyed, was raised by prejudice, and was anything but creditable to the judgment (which was never used) of the American public. The manner in which she resented the mortification she experienced was ill-judged; and her attack upon Jim Crow Rice, although not intended as ill nature, was so construed, and gave him an opportunity to lampoon her with effect, in what he termed his own lyric style, turning all her efforts into ridicule. Every body joined in the hue-and-cry against her, and seemed determined to prevent her success: every opportunity was eagerly seized to wound her pride. How well this succeeded, her speedy return to England proclaims; but this result was the effect of accident, not design. A brilliant campaign was anticipated for her; and her failure is to be attributed to occurrences which took place out of the theatre. To her husband, Mr. Charles Matthews, the audience was better disposed: every thing he did was appreciated, and the praises lavished upon his professional efforts were intended as another thorn to be planted in her side, by building up a reputation for him upon her downfall. His merit I am fully willing to admit; but I question whether he felt flattered by the approbation he received in the United States. He made his appearance in Philadelphia as Peter Pyke, in "A Loan of a Lover;" "Metley, in "He would be an Actor;" and Charles Swiftly, in "One Hour, or the Carnival Ball." Their engagement was a succession of houses—bad, worse, worst; and on the 20th of October, they brought it to a close with "The Welsh Girl," "Clatter versus Patter," "The Handsome Husband," and the "Carnival Ball." They declined visiting either Baltimore or Boston, and returned forthwith to London, where Madame, no doubt, has recovered the equanimity of her temper, and arrived at the conclusion, that the Yankees are uncivilised brutes, who cannot appreciate good acting. In truth, she has good cause for her spleen.

Celeste followed, as Madeline, in St. Mary's Eve; and to oppose Forrest's career at the Walnut-street Theatre, played nightly in two pieces, and, on the 3d of November, announced positively her last appearance (until the next time). Her farewells have become truly laughable; but they seem always to answer the purpose of a full house.

Power played on the 5th, Mary O'More; and on the 18th, after his usual success, announced his benefit, Pandemon O'Reafferty, in "Born to Good Luck," and Larry Hoolagan, in "More Blunders than one," when his rich brogue was no longer heard within the walls of Old Drury, but was transferred to the Haymarket, London.

Mrs. H. Cramer played Mrs. Haller, on the 24th of November; a really clever stock actress. And on the 4th of December, Celeste again—Toujour Celeste! another farewell benefit on the 22d of December. Wallack, now the popular manager of the National Theatre, in New York, played the Brigand; Mrs. Walstein, a humble but useful member of the company, took her farewell of the stage, on the 8th of January, to seek retirement in the arms of matrimony—may she be happy. On the 14th of January, 1839, Mr. Seguin and Miss Sheriff opened in "Le Somnambule." Of Mr. Wilton, it would be superfluous to say more than that he supported his high reputation as a tenor singer, and warbled himself into the good graces of the audience. Of

MR. SEGUIN,

I may add, there is a vein of rich, comic humour flowing through every part he undertakes, which would have made him a favourite as a comic actor in the best days of the drama, without the aid of the rich bass voice which reaches your ear in a full tone of melody. He is the buffe par excellence of English opera, a position he will long retain; and strong indeed must be he that rivals pretension to fame, who can wrest the title from him.

Mrs SHERIFF,

the last named, by no means the least of the trio in the songstresses who have visited the New World. Her second only to Mrs. Wood; and the success of the of "Amilia," at New York, has given her fame and reputation throughout the United States superior to any she enjoyed in London. Aided by Wilson and Seguin, she accomplished the usual tour of European Artistes, returning to England with pleasant reminiscences, a purse well filled with dollars, the result of Yankee admiration of her talent; not having been involved in any theatrical fracas, so fatal to the popularity of the stars, who frequently permit their tempers to get the better of their common sense, and by one hasty expression of anger mar all their future prospects.

On the 18th of January, "Amilia," the music of which had enchanted the New Yorkers, and held possession of the stage to the exclusion of any other opera, was produced at the Chestnut Street Theatre. I had presented it sufficiently well at the Walnut Street to destroy any great excitement; the airs had become familiar, and, notwithstanding the full force of the chorus from the National Theatre, it failed to draw money. If I am asked for my proof, behold it in the fact, that neither Miss Sheriff, Mr. Wilson, nor Mr. Seguin would venture to take it for a benefit. It was one of those fair (unfair) movements in management, which frequently overthrow well-laid schemes. That the opera was better done at the Chestnut Street Theatre, as a whole, nobody will be fool-hardy enough to deny; but there were detached portions better executed at the Walnut Street, while the scenery was far superior to that presented at Old Drury; and many preferred the counterfeit to the genuine "Amilia."

Herr Cline, Mrs. Weston, and Miss Clarence Wells, filled up the month of February; and the 4th of March astonished us with the presence of my old friend, the Sioman. She opened in "Isabella," he in "Sam Saveroy"—attraction gone never to return! While their numerous personal friends rejoiced to see them once more, the public in general cared nothing about them; and even Sioman's ten comic songs failed to produce a house on his benefit night that he would have been willing to pay five hundred dollars for, before the doors opened, as he did to Mr. Warren, for his first Philadelphia.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Season of 1834-49. Increase of the Prices of Admission. A tious Step. A Compliment from a distinguished _____ Ferrest, as "Richelieu" Return to the Old Prices. Barons. Booth in a Crazy Fit. ■ Letter, but no Answer. Mr. Fitzwilliam. Mrs. Vandenberg.
 Charles Koon. Mademoiselle Fanny Elder. _____ Miller

THE late season of the Walnut Street Theatre having in some measure retrieved the losses of the previous one, and the arrangements for the campaign of 1839-40 giving promise of a continuation of success, having secured the services of E. Forrest, Burton, Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Seguin, Horncastle, and Latham, Nichols, and his wife to succumb upon. Mr. Henry G. Freeman, after these engagements were made, gave me to be the board of agents had come to the conclusion, not to renew my lease unless I agreed to raise the price of admission to the Pit (the support of the house, nothing but this stupid arrangement could drive away), to thirty-seven and a half cents. Never having previously charged more than twenty-five cents, and having resisted every argument of Forrest, Augusta, and others, to tamper with the prices, I was compelled to yield my judgment to the dictation of gentlemen who, understanding their own business, might, at least have given me credit for understanding mine, after, with care and labour, I had raised their theatre to a reputation which I never, in Wake's time, enjoyed. Remonstrance, argument, all were vain—the alternative, leave the theatre. Would to heaven I had done so. I was throughout my connection with the H. G. Freeman—for he was the gentleman on the board and his satellites; they might oppose his views, but, on the system of freedom of election, if they did, next year they could not retain their seats in the board, his overwhelming vote and interest placing him puppet he chose to nominate in the position of an agent)—more I yielded, the more he demanded, until at last worn out by the positive injustice of his demands, and the insolent contempt with which a letter addressed to the board of agents was treated, I resolved to give up the theatre. Forced to drive away the staunch support of the house, by levying an advance of fifty per cent. upon the admission, for no other reason than that the Chestnut Street Theatre had advanced their prices; and Mr. H. G. Freeman being also a member of the board of agents of that theatre, sacrificed me. What was the Chestnut Street Theatre, or its arrangement of prices to me, or to English opera, a position he will long retain; and strong indeed must he be that rivals pretension to him, who can wrest the title from him.

MISS SHERIFF,

although the last named, by no means the least of the trio in the list of the songstresses who have visited the New World. She stands second only to Mrs. Wood; and the success of the opera of "Amilie," at New York, has given her fame and reputation throughout the United States superior to any she enjoyed in London. Aided by Wilson and Seguin, she accomplished the usual tour of European Artists, returning to England with pleasant reminiscences, a purse well filled with dollars, the result of Yankee admiration of her talent; not having been involved in any theatrical fracas, so fatal to the popularity of the stars, who frequently permit their tempers to get the better of their common sense, and by one hasty expression of anger mar all their future prospects.

On the 18th of January, "Amilie," the music of which had enchanted the New Yorkers, and held possession of the stage to the exclusion of any other opera, was produced at the Chestnut Street Theatre. I had presented it sufficiently well at the Walnut Street to destroy any great excitement; the airs had become familiar, and, notwithstanding the full force of the chorus from the National Theatre, it failed to draw money. If I am asked for my proof, behold it in the fact, that neither Miss Sheriff, Mr. Wilson, nor Mr. Seguin would venture to take it for a benefit. It was one of those fair (unfair) movements in management, which frequently overthrow well-laid schemes. That the opera was better done at the Chestnut Street Theatre, as a whole, nobody will be fool-hardy enough to deny; but there were detached portions better executed at the Walnut Street, while the scenery was far superior to that presented at Old Drury; and many preferred the counterfeit to the genuine "Amilie."

Herr Cline, Mrs. Watson, and Miss Clarence Wells, filled up the month of February; and the 4th of March astonished us with the presence of my old friends, the Slomans. She opened in "Isabella," he in "Sam Savoury"—attraction gone never to return! While their numerous personal friends rejoiced to see them once more, the public in general cared nothing about them; and even Sloman's ten comic songs failed to produce a house on his benefit night that he would have been willing to pay five hundred dollars for, before the doors opened, as he did to Mr. Warren, for his first benefit in Philadelphia.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The Season of 1839. Increase of the Prices of 1839. A Disastrous Step. Compliment from a distinguished 1839 Forrest, as "Richelieu." Return to the Old Prices. 1839 Booth in a Crazy FIT. Letter, but no Answer. Mrs. Fitzwilliams. Miss 1839 Charles Kean. Mademoiselle Fanny Kisher. 1839 Death of her 1839

THE late season at the Walnut Street Theatre having some measure retrieved the losses of the previous one, and my arrangements for the campaign of 1839-40 giving me confidence of a continuation of success, having secured the services of E. Forrest, Burton, Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Sagnin, Horncastle, and Latham, Nichols, and other horses to commence upon. Mr. Henry G. Freeman, after these engagements were made, gave me notice that the board of agents had come to the conclusion, not to renew my lease unless I agreed to raise the price of the theatre to the Pit (the support of the house, that nothing but a stupid arrangement could drive away), to thirty-seven and a half cents. Never having previously charged more than twenty-five cents, and having refuted every argument of Forrest, Augusta, and others, to tamper with my prices, I was compelled to yield my judgment to the dictation of gentlemen who, understanding their own business, might, I should have given me credit for understanding mine, after, with care and labour, having raised their theatre to a reputation it had never, since Blake's time, enjoyed. Remonstrance, argument, was vain—the alternative, leave it to the will of heaven I had done so. But throughout my business connection with Mr. H. G. Freeman—for the other gentlemen of the board were but his puppets: they might oppose his views, but, the system of election, if they did, year they could not retain him in the board, his overwhelming vote and interest placing him puppet he chose to nominate in the position of an agent—the more I yielded, the more he demanded, until at last worn out by the positive injustice of his demands, and the contempt with which a letter addressed to the board of agents was treated, I resolved to give up the theatre. Forced to drive away the support of the house, by levying an advance of fifty per cent. upon the admission, for no other reason than that the Chestnut Street Theatre had advanced its prices; and Mr. H. G. Freeman being also a member of the board of agents of that theatre, sacrificed me. What was the result of the Walnut Street Theatre, or its arrangement of prices to me, or to my

They had continually trifled with the prices of admission, I never—maintaining that one fixed price was the way to insure steady patronage. The consequence was, when, as it had always happened, the Walnut Street managers reduced their prices to the old standard, I was charging seventy-five and thirty-seven and a half cents, the same price, and possessed not the power to reduce to my old prices, without the consent of the board of agents, (that is, Mr. H. G. Freeman). After having ruined the engagement of every star, and played fifty-seven nights under the expenditure of the theatre, fifteen of which yielded only fifty dollars, and in one hundred and fourteen nights having lost six thousand dollars, on the 25th of January, 1840, I graciously received permission to do as I liked, with regard to the prices. I did not lose one night in availing myself of it. Closed for a week, hoping to make the audience forget it—but they were not to be whistled back—my ruin was sealed—the doom irrevocable. The board of agents of the Walnut Street Theatre, who should have been my support, the cause, the only cause. During a season of two hundred and sixty-one nights one hundred and fifty-five produced less than half the amount of the nightly expenses required to keep the doors open. The seven worst weeks ran thus: 320 dollars, 284 dollars, 261 dollars, 292 dollars, 339 dollars, 313 dollars, 261 dollars, not the amount of a single good house to pay the expenses of a whole week. Whoever is familiar with the expenditure of a theatre may make a calculation of the losses entailed upon the poor manager, by gentlemen attempting to conduct his business according to their notions of right and wrong. What a debt of gratitude I owe to the committee of the Walnut Street Theatre — which I found a barn, with scarcely sufficient roomery to act a plain comedy, tragedy, or farce, and which I left the best stocked theatre for melo-drama, with machinery, &c., in the United States.

Endeavouring, if possible, to stem the tide which I thus early saw must bear me immediately on to ruin, I had prepared appropriate decorations, by Hielge; and although I closed on Saturday, the 14th of September, the longest theatrical season on record, I opened on Monday the 16th, with the theatre renovated, newly painted, seats re-covered, [proscenium altered, and kept my curtains down exactly half an hour yond its time. So like magic did it was three nights before the audience could be assured that such a thing had been accomplished. On the Wednesday evening, while seated in the green-room, my ears were assailed by three hearty cheers, which I at first supposed were meant for approbation to Mr. E. Forrest, in Damon, but on walking to the stage, I was told the audience had just discovered the deco-tions, and were calling for the manager. Upon this effort, so well arranged against time, the press were perfectly silent; a proof what attention their reporters pay to the affairs of a theatre, where the manager does not request a notice. I was anxious to avoid the notice of any change of price in the admission, and leave it to its own course.

Forrest commenced the season with "Virginia," to 395 dollars; played the "Gladiator," "Damon" twice, "Metamora" twice, and "Othello" "Carwin" for Tuesday, September 24th, 1839, I produced "Richelieu" a style that surprised everybody. The dresses cost me six hundred dollars, and were made by A. J. Allen. The costume the exact age of Louis XIII. of France, the scenery new, the chairs and tables of the same style and date; so perfect was everything, that after the first night Mr. Forrest called me into his room, and after many compliments, concluded thus: "For what you have done for the honour of the profession I will play one night gratuitously for you at the end of this engagement; select any play you think proper." Such a proffer, on such an occasion, from such a man, was a feather in the cap of a manager, which no one has been able to pluck away from me. I never heard of him being equally liberal to any of my contemporaries. The play was cast thus: Richelieu, E. Forrest; De Mauprat, Cunner; Benadas, Matthews; De Baringhen, Wemyss; Joseph, Vaché; Francois, J. Smith; Louis XIII., Grierson; Huguet, Porter; Gaston, Burgess; Clermont, Myers; Captain of Archers, M'Bride; Governor of the Bastille, Kembles; Jailor, Horn; Julie Mortimar, Mrs. Hunt; Marion De L'Orme, Miss Matthews (now Mrs. Eddy). Although play was thus well acted, the receipts of the first night were only dollars; second, dollars; third, 367 dollars; fourth, 342 dollars; regularly falling off slightly every night. The blight of the prices had fallen upon this whole engagement, and every ment that followed throughout a season which promised so much. Forrest's benefit 352 dollars, but fifty cents, twenty-five cents, he last season dollars, and 351 dollars, instead of dollars, at increased prices. I declined taking "Richelieu," and also "Metamora," which was acted to 289 dollars. The offer was a liberal one on the part of Forrest, although not so productive as we both anticipated. This first engagement, at the commencement of fifty-six nights during the year, left the treasury a deficiency of about seven hundred dollars, including the expenses of producing the play of "Richelieu." Mr. Forrest's performance of this part I can scarcely find words to speak in terms of sufficient praise; it was one of those masterly efforts of genius that sets criticism at defiance, full of beauty, full of faults; but an endeavour to analyze the latter would lead your pen into a strain of panegyric before you had completed half a dozen sentences, by the discovery of a flash of genius so brilliant; as you the correctness of your judgment, and pronounce you determined to expose, a necessary foil to the excellent effect which you evidently devoted no time to the study of character, but words of the part to memory in a hurry; appeared in it before the public in a hurry; before them, to polish his crude ideas of the author as chance might direct; giving full to imagination—an effort no but a great actor would have dared attempt. That Richelieu was not in years an man, even at the time of his death, history informs but having been a ronc in youth, his impaired constitution became too feeble to support his extraordinary vigour of thought and mind. Forrest represented him as a feeble, tottering old man, thus availing himself of stage trick to give greater effect to his outbreak of passion, and anathema pronounced on Bonades at the end of the fourth act, was equal any of Keen's best efforts, of a similar nature; taking his audience by and charging onward, until their admiration broke forth into involuntary acknowledgment of his excellence, continuing several seconds after the fall of the curtain the actor from their view. sudden appearance before the King and the spirators, who congratulating themselves upon his death, and the overwhelming sway of his tone and countenance, when refused the pardon of De Mauprat, by his sovereign, the perfection of art—but his La, La, La, Count Bonades—La, La, La, in the last was not deserving of applause received, and unworthy of Forrest—in my opinion the greatest blemish in the whole play;—but as a whole, Richelieu will find a better representative. Macready Vandenhoff fall infinitely below Forrest, by comparison, in character. former gentleman shows the effect of long application and intense study thrown at once into by genius; yet is strange, while every body Richelieu of Forrest's greatest efforts, and receipts of the treasury when he acts it, fall short of his average houses. of this must be in play, of interest a common observer, of that class of society who form the majority to the theatre.

Burton, the of October, played "Paul Pry Billy Luckaday." For six nights his houses averaged only dollars; his benefit was 658 dollars. Hill followed with no better success; two hundred people in the pit, which used to average 600 dollars nightly, was the result of the oppression on the part of the stockholders, and forced submission to it upon mine. On the 4th of November Mr. and Mrs. Seguin and Mr. Horncastle, appeared in "Der Freischutz." I have Mr. Seguin's written testimony, that out of London he had never seen the scenery of this opera so well put upon the stage; yet the second night produced only 170 dollars. Mr. Seguin's benefit only $47; Mr. Horncastle's 138 dollars; Mr. Latham, 100 dollars, and Mrs. Seguin's 401 dollars. "Damn all stockholders and their interference, as Goldsack damns all dancing masters and their umbrellas, when sung into the ditch." Forrest returned on the 25th of November; his horses wore them on the former occasion. The horses, to whose exertions I was so much indebted last season, commenced on the 11th of December, and although "The Forty Thieves," "Marmion," "The Secret Mine," "The Siege of Tripoli," "Kenilworth," "Blue Beard," and "Billy Button" were offered as attractions, empty benches—and why don't you lower the prices!—what did you think them for!—were the only objects of the season. The 1st of January, New Year's night, only 259 dollars: the overflowing pit, three hundred and twenty-four tickets were all that I could sell, and two new pieces, which the horses appeared. Seven benefits, the companies alone, yielded 1000 dollars of nightly expenses, up to the 1st of January, 1840. Never was a bright prospect so cruelly killed, murdered, as my arrangements were this season. On the 3d of February, I announced a return to the good old prices, and a new piece, "Sadah and Kalarade." Mr. Sefton having engaged for me in London, Mr. Macintosh, the stage carpenter of Madame Vestris' Theatre, a complete alteration at my own expense, was again made, and I introduced to light the theatre, from the borders instead of the old plan of wing-ladders. The American Theatre, 100 Walnut Street, under my direction, was the first to introduce the method, now so universally approved and adopted, the introduction of these alterations. The Agents of Agents liberally contributed 1000 dollars, leaving me to pay eight hundred, in making an attempt to escape from the slough of despond, in which they plunged me. All I could do—"Sadah and Kalarade," with all the scenery and dresses, failed; the first night yielding only $77 dollars, 100 dollars, of which was in the pit; but my pit customers were too justly offended to forgive the past, and left me to extricate myself, if I could, without their aid, although to see Master Diamond and Sanford, they did once honour me with their presence, to the amount of seven hundred and four tickets, in a house of 740 dollars. On the 19th of March, Booth commenced an engagement, and on the 16th, for the first time, in all our engagements, failed to appear as

"Richard the Third," swigging as his reason, that I was business, by playing for Mr. Murdoch's benefit, at Street Theatre, and until I came, he would not go upon the stage. This closed our engagement, as I would not permit him to appear on the following night. Burton played twelve nights to more money at the reduced prices, than was [redacted] during his previous engagements. E. Forrest, aided by J. B. Scott, commenced his last engagement for the season, on the 22nd of April, in "Damon and Pythias," to a house of 241 dollars—ruinous work; giving him fifty per cent on the gross amount received each night at the [redacted].

Booth, who promised reformation, and professed penitence, played Hamlet on the 18th of June; and on the 24th, Oronoko, in bare feet. His benefit, on the 27th, Octavian, Shylock, John Lump, and the first act of Richelieu. Throughout this engagement, he had been crazy; and his Richelieu never will be forgotten—imperfect, drunk, and dressed like an English chimney-sweep—on the 1st of May. I found I could no longer place the slightest dependence upon him. He kept faith with me, when he had broken it with almost every manager on the continent; and when taxed with his folly, would say—Ask Wemyss if he believes these stories—he knows I never break engagements. Alas! Mr. Junius, I can no longer, with truth, assert you never did. His twelve nights yielded, including his benefit, 1412 dollars, or 117 dollars per night, for which I paid him, as usual, taking the proceeds of the benefit, 1900 dollars. Quere; how much did I gain by the operation! While rain stared me in the face, and Burton was converting Cooke's Circus into a theatre in my immediate neighbourhood, on the 1st of July I addressed the Committee thus—

"Philadelphia, July 1st, 1840.

"GENTLEMEN,

"The present position of theatricals in this city, and the very heavy loss of the present season, having placed me in a situation to require some little aid from you, I am induced to lay before you the reasons why I think myself entitled to expect from you some consideration.

"It appears from the books of the theatre, that I have expended in lumber, canvas, paints, carriage, and tin-ware, extra carpenter wages, (not including my regular bill for carpenter-work of 12 dollars per week,) upwards of 7,000 dollars, independent of my rent, which, in six years, has amounted to 20,900 dollars. You have likewise received during the same time, from the box for rent:—viz., twenty-five weeks for the first seven months, my 50 dollars per week, 1,250 dollars; forty-five weeks for the second year, at 50 dollars, 2,250 dollars; thirty-five weeks for the third year, at 50 dollars, 1,750; thirty-three weeks [redacted] year, at 50 dollars, 1,650 dollars; fifty-two weeks for the fifth year, at 70 dollars, 3,640 [redacted] sixty-eight weeks for the sixth year, at 70 dollars, 4,760—Total, 13,250 dollars. Thirty thousand two hundred and fifty dollars in [redacted] to the 17,000 dollars, making the gross amount 41,250 amount for the five years and seven months, nearly fifteen per cent per year, reckoning one hundred and seventy-five shares at 235 dollars each.

"The house has been twice decorated by me since it was done by the [redacted] half [redacted] papering [redacted] painting of [redacted]

"A mistake of my own, not discovered until [redacted] late to rectify it, caused me to pay five months' rent before the theatre was ready for performance; and although I can make no complaint upon [redacted] subject, it made to me a [redacted] of 1,700 [redacted] in my expenditure during the first year.

"I now proceed to state what I solicit you to do, and what I trust you will accede to.

"In the first place to require from me no payment in [redacted] for the following year, but to receive the 200 dollars per week from the usual time of opening. Thus making a difference of five weeks in [redacted] the payment of the whole rent. Second, to paint and paper [redacted] lobbies and vestibule, (a new dome if you think proper,) and also the panels [redacted] the boxes, according to a design which I will submit for your approval. Thus giving to the house a fresh appearance to enable me to compete with [redacted] other than [redacted]

"Having laboured industriously for five years and [redacted] months, to make the theatre what it is, in point of scenery and machinery, I trust [redacted] will not think I have made any unreasonable demand [redacted] your courtesy; and by your early answer to this letter, enable me to guide [redacted] future movements accordingly.

"There is one subject more to which I would direct your attention—the police. It is necessary that at least one [redacted] of this burden should [redacted] borne by those who receive the emoluments of the bars, from which, (particularly the [redacted] tier,) all the disorder [redacted] the house arises.

"Yours most respectfully,

(Signed)

"F. C. WENYER."

This letter remained unanswered. Mr. Freeman met me in [redacted] street, and told [redacted] committee would be appointed [redacted] upon me;—none came. The Arch Street Theatre was pressed upon me by many of [redacted] friends, at half the rent I was paying for the Walnut Theatre; and as Mr. H. Freeman, [redacted] Montelius, Mr. Lagies, Mr. Wickersham, [redacted] Peddle [redacted] Mr. Donaldson, after blighting my prospects of almost certain [redacted] success, treated me with contempt, I thought it time to shake [redacted] of the slavery, which [redacted] became too irksome, to the will of [redacted] gentlemen, and sent [redacted] notice [redacted] intention to resign the theatre on the 31st day of July, when my lease expired. These consistent gentlemen suffered Mr. D. [redacted] and Mr. Marshall, my successors, to open the pit at twelve-and-a-half cents, and upper boxes twenty-five cents admission; giving them also the rent of the bars, and charging them no more rent than they required of me without them! Thus, in not making them rent free. Thank you a thousand times, gentlemen, for your kindness. You caught hold of a fool [redacted] you got hold of me, and having me in your clutches, you made me pay the price of [redacted] folly. Not satisfied, like Shylock, [redacted] have your pound of flesh, you continually demanded more than your bargain. Your lucky stars, [redacted] my insolvency, saved you much inconvenience. Could I have prosecuted the suit commenced, for justice, I have [redacted] doubt the [redacted] would have been grinding to [redacted] mortifying to yourselves; and that I should have received [redacted] few [redacted] dollars as a salvo for [redacted] you made myself and family suffer. The rich [redacted] always will oppress the poor man; but retribution sometimes, though rarely, overtakes him: powerful [redacted] [redacted] when least expected. I leave you to enjoy [redacted] honour of the money obtained for bar rent, [redacted] [redacted] know-ledge that you, and [redacted] the manager, should have been [redacted] for permitting nightly the laws to be set at defiance within those [redacted] for your exclusive benefit. The theatre closed on Saturday, the 25th of July, for Medaway's benefit, " [redacted] Floating Beacon," and the "Turnpike Gate," never to [redacted] opened by [redacted] again. In leaving it for the Arch Street Theatre I [redacted] have committed an error; but in six years, two only yielded any profit; the other four entailed upon [redacted] [redacted] losses. Had I been left to follow my own judgment, without the interference of the stockholders, or rather their committee, I should have contrived to have redeemed all mishaps. Fettered [redacted] all my movement, I sank beneath the pressure.

(On the 30th of September, Mr. Charles Kean appeared in the Chestnut Street Theatre, as Hamlet. It is fortunate for [redacted] reputation he has paid [redacted] a second visit, for [redacted] Americans did [redacted] [redacted] his claims to rank as a first-rate artist when [redacted] [redacted] a few years ago. [redacted] has evidently improved in [redacted] style, but there is much [redacted] for improvement left. His father's [redacted] is a charm around his career which [redacted] [redacted] hearts in [redacted] favour; the recollection of his excellence [redacted] [redacted] as the strong inducement to prove himself worthy of his sire's reputation. The best part he acted, during his present engagement, was Claude Melnotte. He looked the part better than any representative I have yet seen, and that is at [redacted] half the battle. On the 15th of October, [redacted] Inverarity, Miss Poole, Mr. Mauvers, and Mr. Martyn, appeared in "Cinderella." Miss Poole was decidedly the favourite; [redacted] Inverarity is ungainly in [redacted] makes horrible faces when singing, and will never [redacted] a favourite in Philadelphia. They produced a [redacted] [redacted] "Fidelio," with some success. On [redacted] [redacted] November, little Fanny Copeland, whom I had seen a ~~few~~ <sup>time</sup> at Dover, whom I remember in London as the Madge Wildfire—alone capable of succeeding Mrs. Egerton, the ~~most~~ <sup>most</sup> drollery in female form, made her appearance as Peggy, in the "Country Girl," therein showing her judgment, making the audience believe she was nothing more than a tolerable actress, until, in Widow Wiggins, she sent them out of the theatre delighted, to talk of nothing ~~but~~ <sup>but</sup> they could induce a friend or companion to ~~visit~~ <sup>visit</sup> the theatre on the following evening. Never did an actress make so great a hit on her first appearance, and nightly she continued to ~~win~~ <sup>win</sup> upon the favour of her audience. Twelve nights ~~ago~~ <sup>ago</sup> Peggy, Widow Wiggins, Albina Mandeville, Widow Brady, Sally Scraggs, Helen Worrett, Madame Manetta, Kitty Skylark, and Louisa Lovetrick. In broad farce she is irresistible; and now and then a little touch of pathos falls beautifully from her lips; but in elegant comedy there is too much of the chamber-maid. Helen Worrett was too much for her; and Albina Mandeville would have been as well let alone; but it is unjust to find ~~fault~~ <sup>fault</sup> quibble about one or two parts, where to ~~make~~ <sup>make</sup> her audience anxious for return. Mrs. ~~will~~ <sup>will</sup> make more money in the United States than any lady who ~~has~~ <sup>has</sup> visited it, with exception of Miss Fanny Kemble.

On the 30th of December, R. C. Maywood announced his intention of withdrawing from the firm of Maywood & Co., and leaving his partner, Mr. L. T. Pratt, alone in his glory.—Maywood has been becoming daily ~~more~~ <sup>more</sup> and ~~more~~ <sup>more</sup> unpopular, ~~and~~ <sup>and</sup> need not have forced ~~him~~ <sup>him</sup> to lay down the sceptre ~~he~~ <sup>he</sup> had wielded so long. Every manager is popular or unpopular, according as the breeze of public favour ~~blows~~ <sup>blows</sup> in; and ~~the~~ <sup>the</sup> stock-holders drove him from the helm, ~~as~~ <sup>as</sup> he had a sweet revenge, for ~~they~~ <sup>they</sup> ~~for~~ <sup>for</sup> ~~him~~ <sup>him</sup> ~~from~~ <sup>from</sup> the Atlantic ~~and~~ <sup>and</sup> charge of ~~the~~ <sup>the</sup> Theatre, as the only person capable of stopping its downward ~~course~~ <sup>course</sup>.

Mr. Pratt announced that Mr. W. R. Wood, as his acting manager, Mr. G. F. Jarvis, as his stage manager, and reduced ~~the~~ <sup>the</sup> price of admission to seventy-five cents, boxes, and thirty-seven-and-a-half-cents, pit. This, more than all other causes, has ruined the prospects of the theatre, being an acknowledgment of a superior order must ~~be~~ <sup>be</sup> charged for at a higher rate; consequently, when ~~the~~ <sup>the</sup> boxes are seventy-five cents, it is generally admitted there is nothing worth seeing, and the theatre is deserted; when, on the contrary, a dollar is demanded for admission, it is paid unwill-lingly, with many [redacted] as [redacted] rapacious disposition of the manager. In the present instance, what an agreeable situation for me; the Walnut Street Theatre demanding the same price for admission as the Chestnut Street. My boast had been, superior talent at less prices; what chance, with equal attraction, had I for success?—None; yet Mr. Freeman stuck like a leech to the bond, until all the blood was gone, and then allowed a short breathing time before final execution. And this gentleman pretended to be actuated in all these dealings by a friendly disposition towards me.

Charles Kean commenced the career of new management on the 30th of December, 1829, as Hamlet; Colata, on the 6th of January, as the Child of the Wreck in the "Wept of the Wept-ton-Wish"; but horses were drawing better houses now than any two-legged animals. On the 11th January she took a benefit, at which poor Finn acted, for the last time, Monsieur Jaques—left New York for his home after a long absence, on Monday afternoon, in the steamboat Lexington, and was one of one hundred and seventy-five who perished by fire, by ice, and by water on that dreadful night.

Colata's last benefit, if she does not take another, was fixed for the 18th of January. Miss Elizabeth Wood, a daughter of the veteran, W. B. Wood, made her first essay as Amanthis, in "The Child of Nature." The time was when such an announcement would have filled the Chestnut Street Theatre. The audience, on the present occasion, might be select, but they were not numerous; the success of the young lady, very doubtful. However, on the 4th of February, she appeared as Amelia Wildenhaim, in "Lovers' Vows." On the 8th of February, Miss Poole, Maevra, and Guibela. A benefit was given for the purpose of raising a fund to present to the widow and children of Henry J. Finn, an actor of whom America should have been proud; but like all such attempts, unless taken up voluntarily by the citizens, they but add mortification to grief: Madame Colata played the Maid of Cashmere, on which occasion I lent the services of Plumer, and would have lent the aid of the whole company, and closed the Walnut Street Theatre on that night, could I have aided the good intentions of both manager and actors towards the family of the deceased.

Colata took another farewell benefit, playing Vanderdecken, in the "Flying Dutchman," Suzanne, and the Frontier Maid. What an indefatigable lady she is—nothing tires—nothing daunts her. She nurses a sick husband all night, and appears as fresh as a lark at rehearsal again [redacted] the morning. We are for ever permitting her to say good bye, and always glad to see her return to say good bye again.

Vanderhoff and daughter succeeded Colata, and Maywood

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

benefit took place on the 9th of March, when Mr. Wilson, Mr. Giubelei, and Miss Sheriff lent the retired manager their aid, ■■■ "Sonnambula," ■■■ playing ■■■ Howison, written by Lockhart, the son-in-law and biographer of Walter Scott, for Mackay ■■■ Edinburgh, to ■■■ the great unknown first ■■■ veated himself, at the "Theatrical Fund Dinner," in ■■■ burgh, as the author of the Waverley Novels.

On the 23rd of March, a novelty was offered for the benefit ■■■ Mr. Pratt, in the shape of "Der Freischutz," in the German language, by a company of German actors. On the 20th, Hervio Nano appeared as the "Gnome Fly," to a very good house. On the 15th of April Charles Kean; and on the 26th, Wilson, Giubelei, ■■■ ■■■ Sheriff produced ■■■ opera of the "Postillion of Longjumeau." ■■■ Fitzwilliam, Herr Oline and Balla terminated the list of stars, and the ■■■ closed for ■■■ season, on the 13th of June, with "Laugh when You Can," and "A Good Night's Rest."

On the same night Mrs. Arann's Garden opened with a loud flourish of trumpets, under the direction of Mr. Ward, with an attempted "Eruption of ■■■ Volcanus," planned by Macintosh, who evidently did not know what he was about; he was straining to produce an effect of something which he had seen or heard of, but which he knew not how to ■■■ plish. The laugh of derision, at the end of the exhibition, at once ■■■ ed all hope of future ■■■ Unpaid bills, assignment for the benefit of creditors, and a hasty departure from Philadelphia, the result of months of preparation, and a system of puffing carried beyond the usual bounds; a fortunate escape, that the deluded spectators did not demolish the canvas and boards, which constituted the only value of this "Eruption," which was to astonish the city—and it did astonish our citizens so much that they have not yet ■■■ to wonder how they could have been so gulled. ■■■ was succeeded by a success as extraordinary. On the 17th of June, 1840,

MADemoiselle FANNY ELISLER,

■■■ divine Fanny! the glorious Fanny! the astonishing Fanny! ■■■ the light ■■■ too—who turned the ■■■ of all the ladies and the hearts of all the gentlemen, who produced a perfect mania for dancing, until the ■■■ of Baltimore danced into the traces of her carriage, proud of the honour of dragging the immortal Fanny from the theatre to her hotel—made her first appearance in Philadelphia as Lauretta, in the ballet of "La Tarantule," and afterwards danced the "Cra-covienne." She was to the ballet what Mademoiselle Garcia had been to opera, crunting a taste which awaits only de-valopement to make a good corps de ballet : pendage to every well-regulated theatre. It is not too much to predict that a theatre appropriated to opera, Italian, as well as English and French ballet, will be found rising up among us, attempting every species of dramatic attempts to rival it. Why the press should have assailed the private character of a young lady whose had not by prodigality, black mail editors alone swar. However their paragraphs may have wounded a sensitive mind, they were upon her power crowded audiences. So brilliant a career, in America, has been recorded. Her price, five hundred per night, prevented the possibility of a making money who had a company of actors to time; but wound up Mr. Pratt's with promised benefit arrangements. New York played off the admitted attraction against her powerful rival, made me for her to play on the same nights the Walnut appeared at the Chesnut. was the gage between ever concluded, but unfulfilled: in the of preparations her reception, I received a note from her husband, stating, abandoned him, and was out of his power to comply with the his contract. Sick, and deserted, appealing to my forbearance and asking commiseration, not in the press so stricken. I returned the ment, cancelled, and saw poor but again. Deep must have been the provocation that induced a woman so devoted as Celeste appeared to be him, ever, and of sickness—yet, death, for long survive the blow. Abandon husband and child and fortune, to seek protection in a land of strangers! Many injurious to her reputation were circulated, but not received credence those who knew the intimately. She returned the United States, on his death, to claim her child, and left America, so long her home, heart-broken, to think her dearly beloved daughter—whom to clasp once more to her heart, she had braved the perils ocean—had been taught to harbour thoughts derogatory mother's honour, and protection shed her by her father's relatives. Poor Celeste! thy case was indeed a hard one—thy last farewell, a mournful one. May your be happy prosperous.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The 1840-'41. W. E. Burton. Charlotte Cushman. Pennsylvania. Buckstone. Opening of the Ark Theatre. Difficulties upon difficulties. Mr. John Brahm. Power's last engagement Philadelphia. The loss of the steamship President. The Manager's last kick. The Opera of "Norma" produced a splendid style. Unjust treatment of Mr. Wood. His letter to the Editor of the "Herald." The Walnut Street Theatre, under management of Dancourt Marshall. Herro Name. Mitchell in Philadelphia.

THE season of 1840-'41 is one which will never be forgotten. What hopes, what fears, what wishes, what throats did give to—to crush in one short year the whole of contending powers, each voice of whom, at the commencement, declared for open war—four Richmonds in the field, and all annihilated. Burton had been actively engaged in altering Cooke's circus into a theatre, to be christened The National, with the avowed purpose of ruining the managers of the Chestnut Street Theatre, little dreaming that his own ruin would precede their downfall. As an actor, Mr. W. E. Burton has no superior on the American stage; but it is always the best who makes the best manager; here are: first—want of nerve to fight a losing battle; in success he is a great general, he dreaded by all who come in opposition to his interest.

His theatre, on the opening night, Monday, the 31st of August, 1840, presented a scene of splendour witnessed in America. In decorating a house for the public, if any fault could be found, it was of ornament, the gilt moulding on a pure ground of white being too much crowded; the eagles supporting the drapery of the proscenium boxes, were the most elegant and beautiful things I saw. Mr. Foster, who was among with Cooke, and whose experience at the Adelphi Theatre, in London, gave him the requisite knowledge, seemed to have bent all this purpose, and succeeded perfectly. Burton was fortunate, too, in securing the services of Haviland as superintendent alterations. The opening piece was "Rivals," "A Roland for an Oliver;" his company, P. Richings stage manager, J. R. Scott, James Thomas, Shaw, Whiting, Graham, Neale, T. Placide, C. Porter, Becket, Brooks, Quayle, Herbert, Oakley, Stafford, Boulard, Woodbury, Master Reed, J. Van Starvooren, Bright, Ince, and Reed; Misses C. Cushman Melton, S. Cushman, E. Petrie, Porter, Fanny Ince, Jones Wilson, Delamere, Collingbourne, Flannigan, Wilkins; Mesdames Brooks, Becket, and Ferris; a strong and judiciously selected stock company, to which his own name added a tower of strength; yet he did not give his company a fair chance. In over anxiety to commence the starring system, he [redacted] their rising popularity. Hacket was the first star—the weakest [redacted] could have selected—and Abbot, who followed was really, as far as attraction was concerned, no star [redacted] all. Graham failed, but appears to have had [redacted] favourable opportunity to display his powers, and, in returning to England, showed that he, at least, possessed a quality most rare in actors—common sense. Of the actors new to the Philadelphia public, whom Barton introduced,

[redacted] deserves more than a passing notice. This young lady is a proof of what perseverance, steadily directed [redacted] object, will accomplish; more especially where genius, giant-like, proceeds hand-in-hand along with it. [redacted] commenced her [redacted] career as a singer, announced as a pupil of Mr. Maeder, her voice pronounced to be of a most extraordinary nature, rarely possessed by a female. [redacted] failed, whether from loss [redacted] voice, or deficiency in her musical education, [redacted] both, I cannot record; but nothing daunted her. Repudiated as a singer, I find her grasping at once at the honours of tragedy—attempting the part of Lady Macbeth, (since so admirably sustained by her,) but at this time beyond her powers. Not discouraged by this second failure, if [redacted] is not too harsh to term it so, I [redacted] her descending from the stilts of the Bowery Theatre, under Hamblin—occupying the humble station [redacted] a walking lady at the Park Theatre, in New York, cheerfully performing any part allotted [redacted] her by the manager, [redacted] the same time closely studying the manners and peculiarities of [redacted] European actors, male or female, with whom her position brought her in contact; and, as subsequently [redacted], carefully hoarding the [redacted] ledge of her art thus acquired for future action, yet not advancing with rapid strides in the favour of the audience, by whom she was tolerated, but not supposed to possess the talent [redacted] they afterwards became proud to honour. Her [redacted] mind at once perceived, that the only means of success was to cultivate the acquaintance of the gentlemen conducting the newspapers; fugitive pieces of poetry appeared in the papers, and in the popular periodical magazines, under the signature of "Charlotte Cushman." These answered the double purpose of placing her name before the public, as a lady of literary talent, and securing the notice of the publishers to her dramatic career. At length, Nancy Sykes, in "Oliver Twist," gave her an opportunity of proving what she was capable of accomplishing. As a portrait of female depravity, it was painfully correct; and in all her future career, she never surpassed the excellence of that performance. In leaving the Park Theatre, to join Burton in Philadelphia, she at once opened the road to that fame which she rapidly acquired; here she had a field for the prosecution of her abilities, which was at this time filled by older and abler favourites in New York. The success of the "Naiad Queen" carried her name triumphantly along with it; and at the end of the season, she had assumed a position, which enabled her to return to the Park Theatre, as the leading actress of the American stage; and her ambition will not be satisfied, until she can add, the leading actress of the English stage, as she progresses in her future career. The visit of Mr. Macready to the United States, and the high opinion he entertained of her merit as an actress, opened the road to London, where her success will secure not only renown, but fortune, on her return to her native country.

Of late years it has become the fashion to place theatres under the direction of ladies, and Miss Cushman has figured as the manager of the American Theatre, in Walnut Street, under my successor, Mr. Marshall; but even the popularity of her name could not command success in such an undertaking,—here she proved incompetent. At the end of one season, W. B. Blake was announced as her assistant, (but, in fact, her manager,) to give her an opportunity of retiring, without wounding her feelings, sufficiently mortified by the knowledge, that the reins of power must pass from her hands, or the doors of the theatre be closed for want of patronage. Here is another defeat to be over-mastered; and I risk little in prophesying, if ever a National Theatre is erected in New York, upon purely American principles, Miss Cushman will be one of the great promoters of the design, and not unlikely the lessee and manager; she is fully impressed with Richelieu's motto—"There is no such word as fail;" and in the spirit of good feeling I say to her, go ahead.

The Chestnut Street Theatre was opened under Pratt and Dinmore, (the late treasurer,) on the 29th of August. One night previous to the opening of the National, Murdock was announced as the stage manager; the performances, the "School for Scandal" and "Popping the Question," stars announced, Fanny Elliker, E. Forrest, Power, Mr. and Mrs. Wood, and Buckstone. The last named gentleman made his first appearance on the 7th of September, as Jammy Wheedle and Selim Pettibone; one of the few authors who have proved themselves also good actors. Buckstone's reputation depends more upon his writing than his acting, yet there is a quaintness of manner and peculiarity of voice, which renders him, without [redacted] a [redacted] theatrical company. As a star, he [redacted] no pretensions to notice, and wisely joined his fortunes to Mrs. Fitzwilliam, who found in him an able assistant, and thus [redacted] position which alone he never could have held [redacted].

[redacted] the 7th of September, I announced the opening of [redacted] Arch [redacted] Theatre, under [redacted] direction. Hielge had [redacted] decorated the house; the gas had been introduced; [redacted] painted for a new piece, entitled the "Provost of Paris"; Hadaway had been appointed stage manager, and every thing wore the aspect of a prosperous commencement. Mr. Thomas Newton marred all my prospects; he had promised me faithfully, if I would permit him to take off the hands employed [redacted] the Arch Street Theatre for two days, to [redacted] Mr. Burton to open, [redacted] gas fixtures he was also making, [redacted] would bring down all [redacted] force from the National Theatre on the Tuesday, and be ready for me in time. I assented; but the gas fixtures were so incomplete, on the first [redacted] the National, Burton would [redacted] permit a single hand to leave his place until all was finished. In this he [redacted] perfectly right; but the two days lost on my work [redacted] attended with [redacted] disagreeable consequences. At six o'clock, on the evening of the 7th of September, Mr. Nicholson, the Superintendent of the Philadelphia Gas Company, sent me word that the pipes had not been proved, and the gas could not be turned on. In vain I pleaded the ruin which must follow such a disappointment; he replied, the rules that governed him were imperative, and could not be departed from. The crowd, assembled before the doors, waiting for admission, became clamorous; they were sufficiently numerous to reach across Arch Street, in front of the theatre. I was compelled to inform them that the gas could not be turned on. While I addressed them from the piazza, Mr. Hadaway performed the same kind office on the opposite side of the street. We persuaded them quietly to disperse; and thus, instead of opening to five or six hundred dollars, which appearances indicated, on the 7th of September, I opened on the 8th, with Rice, (Jim Crow,) to 152 dollars. Who can control the uncertain chances of fate? Had I known or dreamed of the possibility of such an occurrence at twelve o'clock, I would have ransacked the city of Philadelphia, and been prepared with oil to light the house upon this unfortunate night. It was the first time in my managerial career I had ever appointed a certain night for any certain event to come off, and failed to accomplish it. If Mr. Newton had been an actor, such an occurrence would [redacted] impossible. Why he [redacted] who [redacted] obtained for him the contract, in opposition to the opinion of several of the members of the board of agents—who procured for him the job from Burton, and also the liberation of the fixtures of the Walnut Street Theatre, it was a problem I have tempted to solve more than once, but was inexplicable to me. The consequence was ruin. My resources had been crippled by my last season in Walnut Street; the aid of my friends taxed to the utmost, to enable me to prepare for a campaign, which terminated, as far as I was concerned, without a blow. On the following night, the gas was very imperfectly lighted; and it was half an hour the time of beginning before the lamps in front of the theatre could be lighted, giving to those who presented themselves to purchase tickets, the idea that we could not be ready for performance. The 8th of September yielded 152 dollars, the 9th, 61 dollars, the 10th, 11 dollars, the 11th, 23 dollars, the 12th, a benefit, on the 12th, 185 dollars—the receipts of the four nights, 601 dollars; out of which, Rice, by contract, was to receive 100 dollars. On the Monday, a new piece, and a very good one, entitled "The Sixes; or the Devil and the Dice," produced only 20 dollars. Tuesday 11 dollars, Wednesday 30 dollars, Thursday 18 dollars. On Friday morning I assembled the company in my green room, told them of a contest, and this was useless, entailing misery all around; that they had better, before it was too late, provide themselves with situations for the winter; and thus did they willingly to depend upon my assertions. They deserted me not, even in these apparently desperately circumstances; I deserted them, conscious that distress, starvation and misery alone could attend a further attempt to prosecute such a commencement. The ladies and gentlemen deserve my thanks, which I am proud thus to tender them, for their kind intentions. On Friday, I did not attempt to open the doors; and strolling into Burton's theatre, found myself much amused by a good representation of a piece in which old Time had provided a safe receptacle for all managers. Moyamensing Frieson, my friend Burton, it is dangerous to tamper with; true jokes; a few months found you, among others, ready to avail yourself of this same sanctuary. Who would have thought that I, who felt myself strong in the affections of a certain portion of the play-going community, should have been the first to run, before a shot from the enemy had reached me, a victim to the treachery of a friend. I went to Baltimore where I was awaited by my friends. There politics were turned out of the heads of the population, who were themselves nightly engaged as actors in large processions, bearing lanterns, banners, and soul-inspiring mottoes. Harrison and Van Buren night after night engaged the minds of all, either as active partakers in the exciting scene, or as passive spectators, admiring the splendour with which each party strove, in this contest, to outdo the other. Theatres, or any place of public amusement, were superfluous; even those who possessed the right of free admission would not honour us with their presence. Thus it proceeded from bad to worse, until the 30th of November, I returned again to the Arch Street Theatre, and opened with Hill, having reduced my prices to twenty-five cents, boxes, and pit, twelve and a half cents, to contend against a similar movement on the part of Marshall and Dinneford, at the Walnut Street Theatre. I opened this time to an excellent house, although Mr. Newton had not completed his gas fixtures, and I had been obliged to call in another to finish his work. I had 246 dollars; the pieces, "Sudden Thoughts," "The Green Mountain Boy," and "O. K." Booth opened in Richard, on the 12th of December, to 800 dollars. All promised hope of success, when he again placed the thermometer below zero by appearing upon the stage drunk. Down went the houses to 70 dollars, and 80 dollars, then to 34 dollars, and 18 dollars. The theatre continued open until the 30th of January, when I requested the trustees to release me from all engagements, cancel the lease, and I retired heartily disgusted with every thing connected with the Arch Street Theatre, which to me had been one source of annoyance after another, entailing a loss upon my already crippled resources of three or four thousand dollars.

Rice, Hill, Booth, Sandford, Williams, Wood and his dogs, and Tom Flynn, were the stars. "O. K." "New Notions," "A Wife for a Day," "the Idon of the Sea," "Norman Leslie," "the Serpent Lady," "the Convict's Child," and "the Brasen Drum," the new pieces; the whole season sixty-three nights, ten weeks and a half; the whole receipts, 5830 dollars, of which 1000 dollars were paid to the stars, leaving an average of seventy-three and a half dollars per night. During the last few weeks, arrest for debt followed arrest, execution followed execution, until, to keep my person out of gaol, I was compelled to apply for the benefit of the insolvent laws, a discharge under which I received at the March term of the court in 1841. My large establishments were completely broken up. Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Pittsburgh Theatres, all passed from my hands—my property disposed of under the sheriff's hammer, at a time when real estate would hardly be taken as a gift—ruining me, without aiding my creditors. A theatrical wardrobe, the most extensive in the United States, which ten thousand dollars could not replace, sold for one hundred and thirty-six dollars!!! The Pennsylvania Theatre, which cost me fifteen thousand dollars, exclusive of the mortgage of five thousand dollars, sold, subject to the same mortgage, for sixty-two dollars. The month of April, 1841, found me without one cent, crushed, heart-broken and degraded, by my own estimation, by the white-washing I have been compelled to undergo. I have never been the man since. Difficulties which previous to this epoch in my life, I gloried in surmounting, have been suffered to master me. My energy of character, which gave me nerve to face any emergency, seems to have deserted me, and I have lived to be refused an engagement in the Philadelphia theatres at one-fourth of the amount at which my services therein were formerly eagerly sought for. In all this, let me not forget my obligations to my good friend, Mr. Samuel Hays, the grocer, at the corner of Eleventh and Water St. He was the first as early as June, 1840, to place the sherriff upon my back, in return for the exertions of myself and all the members of the Strembeck family, to recommend him customers, when he first located himself in the neighbourhood of Eleventh and George Street. I had paid him yearly several hundred dollars, and refused to avail myself of the law's delay in discharge of this claim; he was the first to cry mad dog, and loose the officers of the law upon my falling, but not then hopeless fortune. It was a greater satisfaction to me to pay him than it could have been to him to deprive my wife and children of the few comforts which years of untiring industry had placed around them. For the attempt, he has not been, or will he be, forgotten in our many pleasant recollections. Should he ever be placed in a similar situation, may he meet with no such urgent creditor. As a foil to this, thank God, there is one bright spot which cheered me in misfortune. Mr. Wilson, and the carpenters of the Walnut Street Theatre, when they heard of the distress which existed in my family, entered into a subscription from their hard-earned wages (although they were also my creditors to a larger amount than a mechanic ought to lose by his employer,) and tendered it to me. Although I did not accept the offering, the kind feeling which dictated it is imprinted upon my heart; and to those men I feel grateful for the first really pleasant hour I experienced from the time of my failure; it was a balm which soothed my feelings and turned them once more into their proper sphere of action. Mr. Wilson had been placed in his present position by my recommendation to the stockholders, and thus proved that his heart is in the right place.

Having thus brought my connexion as manager of a Philadelphia Theatre, for the present to a close, let me return to the rivals whose movements now occupied the public attention. Mr. E. Forrest was at the Chestnut Street from the 21st of September until the 3d of October, when Power succeeded him, retaining possession until the 24th. On the 27th, Mr. and Mrs. Wood, and Mr. Brough, with Mr. Laffar, commenced an opera season. No sooner was the name of the Woods seen on the play bills, than Burton announces Les Capotals, the engagement of Miss Clifton, Mr. and Mrs. Wendenhoff, Mr. Buckstone, Mr. Braham, Mrs. Fitzwilliam, Mr. Power, Mr. Guibelei, Miss Poole, Mr. and Mrs. Bognin, Mr. Hackett, Mr. Browne, and the promise of an Italian opera. The steam was evidently rising fast—boilers preparing for expansive action, to burst with a terrible explosion, scattering dismay on all around. Either these announcements managerial device to attract attention from Old Drury and the Woods, or the managers must have fallen into a sleep, or have been guided by wrong counsel, to loose their stern upon stars, who alone could enable them to resist the energetic ments of their opponent. On 10th of November, Fanny Ellsler and Mons. Silvain, followed the Woods. Half of Fanny's attraction is gone—the houses good, but not great—the treasury gasping in agony, and the theatre evidently in articulo mortis, playing only four nights a week, not opening the doors the nights on which the graceful Fanny did not appear. Forrest comes once more to the powerful ally, but unable to command success. Then Le corps de ballet; and, and finally, an announcement that the theatre will be closed on the 4th of January, prepare for Bellini's opera of "Norma." want of amusement in this our Quaker City—four open; the Chesnut, National, American, the Arch Street; Raymond and Waring's Circus, Le Otto Motty; Prom Conser a Musard, by Frank Johnson and his celebrated band, to usher in the year 1841.

the 16th November, Tyrone Power, as long support of the Oleanut Street Theatre, deserted Old Drury, newly erected National, where appeared as Sir Patrick O'Plenipo, and Doctor O'Tools. Whether profited by the change in a pecuniary point, is not the question if he lost "caste." Burton gained credit for indefatigable exertion to annihilate Pratt and Dinmore, who seem, in Murdoch, inexperienced as he was in management, to have placed the reins of government in hands too weak to compete with such an adversary as Burton. On the 30th of November, 1840, one of the brightest names in the annals of English Theatres was announced at the National—who appeared as Henry Bartram, in "Guy Mannering." In his best day, he was a miserable actor; but singers—and such singers, so rarely heard—are not expected to be actors. His fame as the first tenor singer of the English stage had long undisputed: "this orange boy" was received at the largest theatre, and no musical festival was considered worth attending which was not. Cathedral, concert-room or theatre, was the magnet of attraction. He heard "Jephtha's Vow" could forget the volume of voice which issued from that diminutive frame, or the ecstasy with which "Waft her Angels through the Skies" thrilled every attentive listener? He ought to have. United twenty years sooner, he not have risked his reputation by coming at all. Like Ince, he was only heard by Americans when his powers of voice were so impaired as to leave them to conjecture what he had been, and mourn that all very fame prepared his condemnation, and he committed a error in selecting a concert-room for his debut in North America; dulling the edge of curiosity which would have filled overflowing on his first appearance. Then, visiting city of Philadelphia, he should have to Chestnut Street, which, Park in New York, can alone give actor lasting reputation. This every star has discovered, who, in their secure better place of public amusement, dig the of their reputation. No failure to attract an audience apparent than his; while but one opinion—that of disappointment—was heard from every body. Whatever Burton promised to give him was to be fully paid; but to draw the anticipated, the manager not fulfil contract. his benefit 14th of December, much displeased the result engaged as auditor with his to Braham, a composer, a reputation which will survive the collection of American failure. his ballads, for simplicity and beauty, have never been excelled.

MR. JOHN BRAHAM,

On 19th of December, Burton produced, under direction of Foster, "the Naiad Queen," the success of for some time eclipsed all other theatrical attraction; the whole public directed nightly to the of the National. As a spectacle, it has never been equalled in the United States; but the great charm was "the Fifty Female Warriors," headed by Miss Charlotte Cushman and Eliza Petrie. Such a display of legs, no mortal man could resist the opportunity of seeing—the theatre crowded nightly—Mr. Burton high road to reap the reward of all exertions—fortune lay before him. B dogged spirit of opposition, and a determination not to be content with his own success, unless he could blight all chance of recovery to the Chestnut Street Theatre, induced him to lay it aside, to produce "Norma," on the 11th of January, for which he was not prepared either in scenery or [redacted] offering Miss Sutton, Mrs. Mardyn, and Miss Laverarity, in opposition to Mr. and Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Bailey, and Mr. Brough, he only exposed his own weakness; and, notwithstanding Mrs. Wood's sickness, after the seventh night, gave him a chance which he could not have calculated upon, the failure of "Norma" more than counterbalancing the success of the "Naked Queen," the dresses of which were pressed into the service of the former piece, and gave Mr. Burton a blow from which he never recovered. The public cried out against this course, and his popularity as a manager was gone—the charm of his name had vanished, and with it, all his future exertions—his doom was fixed. The splendid theatre he had called into existence was destined to pass into other hands. Yet, after all the row, which closed the opera at old Drury, he produced a capital piece, in which the hit at failure of "Norma," the supernumeraries, taking the battle chorus for their cue to strike, and place the theatre in an uproar, caused shouts of laughter and applause every night. It was giving him one blow, while he dealt to his adversaries two—and very hard, uncharitable blows they were.

On the 25th of February, 1841, Tyrone Power [redacted] the last engagement he was ever doomed to act in [redacted] phia. He proceeded to New York, where, on Tuesday, the 9th of March, he made his last appearance on the stage of any country, as Gerald Pepper, in the "White Horse of the Peppers," and Morgan Rattler, in "How to pay the Rent." On the following day he sailed from New York in the steamship President; his fate, to this hour, a sealed book—not a vestige of the ship, her crew, or passengers, have either been seen or heard of. Farewell, Power: long will it be ere thy memory is forgotten, and longer ere thy place will be supplied, upon the stage, which mourns thy loss.

On the 10th of April, Burton produced "Tippoo Saib, or the Storming of Seringapatam," with thirty horses, which proved the manager's last kick—who departed for the National Theatre, in New York, bearing me along with him, as his aid-de-camp, and left Foster to produce the "Seven Champions of Christendom," on the 10th of May, which closed the first season of [redacted] Burton's management in Philadelphia, not much to his satisfaction.

On [redacted] 11th of January, 1841, [redacted] Pratt and Dinmore, aided by the Messrs. Fry, Mr. and Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Baile', [redacted] Mr. Brough, produced the opera of "Norma," in a style so superior as to pluck the feather from the cap of so able a manager as Mr. Wallack, who, until this day, could boast of "Amilie" as the only opera which had been presented to the public, as an opera should be represented; Philadelphia now took the lead. The chorus, sixty in number; the orchestra equally full and complete; the dresses, scenery, properties; and lastly, the principal singers, the best the English stage could boast. "Norma," as produced at the Chestnut Theatre, was a dramatic representation to be proud of. What a pity it should have involved all concerned in difficulty. For seven nights the Theatre presented an array of fashion, pleasing to the spectator, as well as profitable to the manager, when Mrs. Wood, from the nightly exertion required, broke down under the effort, and the theatre closed from the 1st of January. On the 2nd of February it was played for the last time, for a complimentary benefit to the translator, J. R. Fry: tickets of admission on the occasion, two each. The whole affair exploded in a grand row. The receipts nightly taken were not sufficient to pay the nightly expenditure, Messrs. Pratt & Co. wished to make the Woods the last party to be paid, while they expected, and insisted upon being the first. The theatre closed abruptly, and a tempest in a teapot followed; the managers came out in a printed statement in the Courier and Inquirer, from which I quote. They go back to transactions which had previously taken place, admitting that in engagements there was an unpaid balance of 546 dollars, for which they gave a note; but before it reached maturity, urged upon Mr. Wood the propriety of giving up the note, and taking for it the picture of Mrs. Wood, in the lobby of the Chestnut Street Theatre, which cost 660 dollars—the price it appears they paid Mr. Thomas Sully for the picture and frame. Mr. Wood finally consents to this arrangement, and bore off a picture, which Maywood & Co., when "La Samnambula" was filling their treasury to overflowing, insisted upon having painted, to be placed in the most conspicuous part of the theatre, as a mark of admiration for the talent of Mrs. Wood, and to perpetuate the memory of her great success. Now gentlemen, had you spared yourselves this abject piece of flattery, you would have escaped the mortification which followed, and the proof you gave to Mr. Wood of the high value you placed upon the work of art, you so anxiously pleaded to Mr. Wood the privilege of being allowed to have painted, at your expense.

In order to excite public resentment against Mr. Wood, the managers further stated, in previous engagements, (without saying how many,) they had promptly paid him 21,377 dollars—a large sum of money; but, upon mercantile principles, certainly no reason why Mr. Wood should lose by default upon present payments, because he had made money by previous dealings between the parties. They acknowledge a balance due to Mr. Wood of 421 dollars, but do not consider this a sufficient cause for the opera, which on their own statement, it appears, does not pay. The long and short of the matter is—they agreed to give Mr. Wood for the services of his wife, and other artists, one half of the receipts each night; the other half was not sufficient to cover the expenditure of an opera, produced upon so large a scale, and in so perfect a manner. They wished Wood to reduce his terms, and if he refused his assent, they had no objections to reduce them for him, by an unpaid balance, which he resisted. It appears further, by a card from Mr. J. Reese Fry, that the complimentary benefit was accepted solely as the means of meeting responsibilities to certain performers, assumed by his brother, in consequence of the unexpected stoppage of the opera, after the first week's representation. The proceeds of the benefit have all been applied for such purposes. "Neither myself, nor any one in my interest, (so writes Mr. J. R. Fry,) received any further reward from the production, than the delight shared by the public in witnessing the proper performance of the work of a great master."

The newspapers, on an ex parte representation, attacked Mr. Wood, who, smarting under former experience, in handling a gentleman belonging to the press too roughly, wisely resolved to give up the contest, and sail for England. Here is the letter he despatched to Mr. Bennett of the New York Herald, on leaving the shores of the United States.

"At sea, ship George Washington,

"February 8, 1841.

"DEAR SIR,

"I cannot leave these shores without expressing the sincere respect and esteem which Mr. Wood and myself entertain for the American public, while at the same time I make known my sentiments towards those of my own countrymen, who have been the cause of the principal anxieties and annoyances which we have suffered in this country. I can assert, and with the most heartfelt satisfaction I do so, that some of the warmest and best friends I have on earth, are Americans, and beg that it may be distinctly understood, that had my intercourse and business transactions been confined to them alone, no difficulty, I feel assured, would have ever taken place between myself and any portion of the public. Every perplexity in which I have been concerned in this country, has originated with my own countrymen, and I am sorry to add, with Englishmen belonging to my own profession—a profession unfortunately degraded by many belonging to it—who, instead of using the honest means which they possess to dignify and exalt it, find a delight in seeking to bring down to their degraded level, all who aspire to respectability in its ranks. Permit me, sir, also to observe, that the affairs laid to my charge have been of a strictly private nature, and arising out of my business, with which the public have assuredly no more right to interfere than with the private

It appears to me that much of the same kind of subsequent annoyance, might be spared, both to the public and the stage, those who profess to be friends of the latter, would pay less to the stories by the curious of the profession; and the press would be less dignified by criticising justly, without fear or favour, the performances of the stage, and by completely discarding their employ of services of such reporters as entirely neglect, or totally destroy the prosperity of an actor, or are inclined to go extra paths, or to play gratuitously of their favourites, or by any other method to conciliate their good-will, I have long enough in the world, to entertain conviction a plain, straight-forward is the best, and will not, on compulsion, sing gratuitously for every complimentary a few committee-men think proper to patronize, by compelling all performers may happen to be in country to "volunteer" services, at their high displeasure.

As many friends as all my friends, I respectfully leave for the present, without ever intending again to attempt to pursue my profession in this country. I hope to return, after a brief period, with Miss Wood (whose health is at present too feeble to allow her to exercise her art) and shall bring with me several new opera, with one or more singers of established reputation, to support Mr. Wood, who have experienced the displeasure of any one in America, professionally, or otherwise.

"Yours respectfully,
(Signed) "JESSE WOOD,"

may be some consolation to you, Mr. Burton. If Braham proved too strong for your pocket, "Norman" the Woods silenced for a time the batteries of your adversaries altogether. On the 19th of February, the Chestnut Theatre opened for the benefit of Miss Alexina Fisher, when W. R. Blake, who been unceremoniously ejected from Walnut Street Theatre make for Tom Flynn, played a short engagement, Henry Placide appearing on the same nights. It is a shame the theatre should be deserted when such actor plays—all proved useless—and Chestnut Theatre quietly expired, until the first of May, when it once more attempted to raise its head, with Richings as stage manager—a bad doctor in a desperate case; but with the aid of opera, Poole, Mrs. Seguin, Miss Marshall, Manvers, Guibelei, and Seguin, Mr. and Mrs. Wells, he contrived to keep open until the 21st of June, closing with "Norma," (which he revived with Seguin, Poole, Guibelei, with a reduced orchestra chorus,) and "The Fair Lady," for benefit.

I am or two about the American Theatre, Street, which since I resigned leave, when exactions the agents became too onerous, had been by Messrs. Dinwiddie and Marshall, Mr. G. Freeman allowing them to open the theatre, with the upper boxes at twenty-five cents, and the pit twelve-and-a-half cents—an importation of low prices from New York, not required by the state of Philadelphia, but to which even the Chestnut Street Theatre was reduced in 1845. Rare consistency, forcing a man who had worked hard for six years to improve their property, to increase his admission to thirty-seven and a half cents to the pit, and now permitting it to be reduced two hundred per cent; the income of the bars was also surrendered to the new tenants. Am I to believe, gentlemen, that you designedly forced me to abandon the theatre, or that a feeling of anger now prompted your actions towards me by your liberality to my successor? At least I know, while they have been rent free, you have lost five thousand a year by sacrificing your previous tenant—no consolation to me I assure you; although I think I had a claim to a little more favour than ever was extended to me, and was by no means sorry to get rid of the frivolous complaints, continually uttered by Mr. Freeman upon some subject or another. On the 14th of October, the announcement met my eye, while at Baltimore; thus it ran:—Under the sole direction of W. B. Dinnesford; W. R. Blake, stage manager, Fredericks, Charles, Howard, H. Williams, J. Barnes, Harrington, [redacted], N. Porter, Ewing, Curtis, B. Williams, Henry Colvin, W. [redacted], [redacted], Mrs. Flynn, Miss Rock, Mrs. Charles, Mrs. Kinloch, Mrs. La Forrest, Miss Murray, Miss A. Kinloch, Miss J. Kinloch, Miss Brittenham, Mrs. Myers; Collingbourne, Prompter, and eight corps de ballet girls. The play "Honey Moon," and the farce of "A Rascal for an Oliver." Prices of admission—lower boxes 50 cents; second and third tier, 25 cents; the pit 12 and a half cents. Fabulate.

A very strong company who continued to play with success many of the old comedies, but managers never can let well enough alone. I have done the same thing often myself; but a looker-on sees more than a gamster; and in stopping the career of the company for Mr. Herbie Nano, the Gnome Fly, the manager committed an error, which the sudden falling off of his houses soon gave him intimation of. On the 24th of December Booth played; and on the 28th, with a long flourish of trumpets, Blake produced his own play of "Norman Leslie," a very badly constructed tedious melo-drama, long enough for three. I never saw Miss Medina's piece upon the same subject; and do not blame myself upon my own; but comparing the two, and the very effective manner in which it was placed upon the stage, I wonder that any body ventured to look at it after the first night. Hard sentence this—but true. Shortly afterwards, Tom Flynn assumed the management, producing "Manoppa," "Rackwood," and other home-pieces, and The Old Warrant, as the newly-created rulers of the pit it, agreed steadily—now pretty good, bad, until the end of June, when Dinneford and I, for the season, cordially hating each other, determined to separate, each endeavouring to procure the following season, without reference to the other. Now I was importuned to make an offer, which my manager would be accepted, to resume the reins of management. I refused steadily to listen to any overture which did not come directly from the Board of Agents; and then, hinted that I did not think we should agree twelve months. I gave my grievance to their hands, and smarting under it, should have pursued a course diametrically opposite to the one, but it is fortunate we did not come together again. We now maintain an armed neutrality, from which proposals may hereafter issue from either party, with certainty that they would be respectfully received, and carefully considered. On the 7th of July, for three weeks, I assumed the stage management for Dinneford. Here I engaged Graham, from Mitchell's Theatre—a very good actor, whom I should be happy to have with me. While here I lost my lawyer, Mr. Jacob Strembeck, placing my family in mourning, and gladly closed the theatre, under orders, on the 21st of July, for Dinneford's benefit—"Luke the Labourer," "Don Giovanni," and "The Village Lawyer."

On Wednesday the 24th March, 1841, William Jones and W. B. Blake opened the Arch Street Theatre, with "Wives as they Were, and as they Are," and "Of Age To-morrow." Mr. Jones had been of age long enough to keep out of such speculation, with the powerful aid of Forrest's talent, the chief inducement. He was to have forgotten one thing, that that talent has at times to be powerfully paid for. In this, Forrest makes no distinction to friend or foe—if any, he has his in business with more consideration than his friend Henry Placide, Rice, or Forrest, Murdoch, or G. Jones. Judge Conrad's new play of "Aylemore," which have been acted by agreement during his last engagement at the Walnut Street Theatre, was played at the Arch Street Theatre on the 14th of June—nothing could save the management from dissolution, which lingered on to the 26th of June, when, in spite of all the care and attraction that could be offered, its doors were once more closed.

Mitchell, of New York, resolved to try the National in Philadelphia for a month or six weeks. He injudiciously doubled the price charged at the Olympic Theatre, and gave it up at the very time the citizens of Philadelphia were beginning to appreciate the burlesques so admirably performed by his company. He is an able drill-sergeant, and has reaped a handsome reward for his persevering zeal in the city of Gotham, where his audiences enter into all the fun and glee of his pieces with the goût of the most enthusiastic admirers of Hudibras. He commenced his trial here on the 12th of June, 1841, and departed from the city not very favourably impressed with the judgment or taste of our citizens.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Discharge in the Insolvent Court. Stage Manager of the National Theatre, New York. Mutiny among the Stage Carpenters. A Dramma. Mr. Park Benjamin serves the Philadelphia Critics. Burning of the National Theatre. The Bowery Theatre closed by Order of the Chancellor. Thomas S. Hamblin's Address to the Public. Hamblin's Generalship.

HAVING received my discharge and my protection from the Judges of the Insolvent Court, on the 9th of April, Burton, who had taken the National Theatre from Wilson, in New York, offered me the stage management, which I accepted, and proceeded to New York, on Sunday afternoon, April the 10th. On Wednesday, the 13th, we opened with the "Naiad Queen." In all the scrapes I ever was placed in, the opening night at the National Theatre was the most difficult and trying. The mechanics seemed to work unwillingly; and among the theatrical carpenters there was a feeling, that Philadelphia managers had better stay at home—they had no business in New York. Every order was obeyed with a grumble; and, finally, while Burton, who had observed this, was speaking to me upon the subject, one of the men replied to him, when he had justly observed, that he had not addressed his conversation to him—that the men had made up their minds not to be lumbugged. He told him he could leave the theatre. He said he would, and take all the other hands with him too; on which Burton turned to the master-carpenter, and said—"Mr. Johnston, pay these men whatever may be due to them, and turn them every one out of the building." Away he went into the manager's room, when we both burst out laughing at the pretty predicament we were in. This was Tuesday afternoon—the piece was to be produced on Wednesday. He said, "Was I not right?" "Decidedly so. The only thing now to be done is, without loss of time to supply their places." Ben Hamilton and little Mark, the property men, were at once set to work. I was despatched for Mr. Hitchens, Niblo's master-carpenter, and Burton went in search of Professor Mapes, to ask his assistance, as to where or how a few carpenters could be obtained. Jake Johnston, who had been with me at the Chestnut Street Theatre, in Philadelphia, was staunch to the interest of his employer. Mr. Hitchens promised his own assistance, and one more hand in the morning, and so we had to abide the result. Mr. Burton's conduct was prompt and judicious; and if we only got through this difficulty, good government and discipline throughout the theatre would be established at once. He drilled all the ladies in the military evolutions; and with a determination that every thing should be done well, we both went to work.

Wednesday morning the rehearsal was got through tolerably well, although Miss Charlotte Cushman could not find her way to the theatre until I was despatched in a cab to bring her there in style—wishing her, in my heart, any where but ~~bringing~~ <sup>bringing</sup> me! Here a new difficulty arose: Miss Eliza Petrie, who had been sent for from Philadelphia, had not arrived, and there being ~~now~~ no possibility of seeing her before five or six o'clock, we were compelled to make ourselves as easy as possible with the assurance received, that she would be with us in time. Oh! the horrible confusion of that afternoon. Nothing ready—everybody hurrying everybody. Five o'clock down I hurried to the steamboat, and returned with the cheering news that Petrie had arrived, and I had safely left her at Miss Cushman's lodgings to prepare for the theatre. I believe this news spurred us both on; it was now past the time when the doors should open. Not a transparent water for bath hung on a truck either made or mounted. Burton now came to me with a face full of anxiety: "Can we open?—Don't give it up until the last moment. Have a placard painted, stating that some of the machinery has not arrived from Philadelphia. If the worst comes to the worst, dismiss them with a promise for to-morrow evening; we are on the horns of a dilemma. If we play, in all probability we damn the piece; if we do not, we damn the prospect of the season. Now, where is Johnston? Jake, can you get us through this, if we make an act, to set the bath scene? For the honour of old Philadelphia, don't see us beaten this way." "Mr. Wemyss, I will get you through it; all I ask is the act drop before the bath scene." "Burton, he says he will do it; what will you do?" (a pause). Then he said, "Have you nerve to try it? It will prove your stage-managership. It is for you to say, you are the master; I am ready, if you will run the risk." "Go ahead!" In two minutes, the doors were open, and in half an hour the house comfortably filled: and at half-past seven o'clock up went the curtain. I had but one bell that would ring, to give the carpenters warning for all the traps. I had to run below to see every trap ready, and give the cue. Nixson, prompter, worked well; and never did man aid another. Burton did me on this occasion. The awful bath scene passed, without disapprobation—for a most scandalous affair it was—but was over, I felt assured that all would go right. After Burton had finished his part, in a banner, he headed the procession on the stage, acting as the fugleman. Cushman's admirable method of commanding her female rioters, whose dresses and make-up made the theatre resound with applause, brought the third act, or, on this occasion, the fourth act, to a close, amid a peal of approbation. The last act took care of itself. I had the pleasure of hearing Burton called for; and black, tired, and begrimed, he took me by the hand, and thanked me. Off we started, in due time, to Windhurst's, where, over a hot supper, we laughed at our fears of the morning; and thus ended my first night of management in New York. To those unaccustomed to theatres, it will appear marvellous, but it is not the less true.

On the 29th of April, I made my first bow in New York, at the National Theatre, (since the summer of 1824, when the Chatham Theatre, under Barrere, was in the full tide of success,) as Belmour, in "Is he Jealous?" Miss Charlotte Cushman playing Harriet, and Eliza Petrie, Rose. As this little piece depends entirely on the dialogue, these young ladies amused themselves at my expense; if they ever read their parts, it certainly was not with any intention of committing the words to memory. Before an audience with whom I was familiar, such an occurrence would have been of no consequence, but on this occasion, I not only felt mortified, but expressed my mortification in no very measured terms. My reputation as an actor, having some character to uphold, was placed in jeopardy by way of joke! and it was not until I played Flexible, in "Love, Law and Physic," I had an opportunity of proving my pretensions to histrionic fame were well founded.

The next difficulty in management, was that Burton, always on the look-out for novelty, and as if in defiance of the dear-bought experience of his late season, in Philadelphia, laid out "Naisd Queen," to announce Booth, J. R. Scott, and Miss Clarendon, in "Othello," for Monday night. He went to Philadelphia, on Sunday morning, and on Sunday evening, about ten o'clock, Mr. Scott, came into my room, at the American Hotel, to give me personally information he could act on the following night. In vain I endeavoured to persuade him to remain in New York, as he was here, and if disappointment must accrue, to let it fall on the Philadelphia managers. He said no, he had pledged his word to return, on Monday, and by the first train in the morning he intended to start. Why he took the trouble to show himself in New York, on Sunday evening, to say he could not play on Monday, is a question more easily asked than answered. In management, I used to boast I never suffered myself to be placed in a situation from which, by the exercise of a little ingenuity, I could not extricate myself with credit. Finding arguments useless, I told him to sleep upon the matter, and so would I, and in the morning I trusted he would change his opinion. My first inquiry, on Monday, was for Scott. My messenger returned with the intelligence that he was gone. Burton away—no Othello—and an Iago, of whom I whom I had more doubt and misgiving than the rest. Booth was evidently not himself, and the information I had to impart to him was not calculated to improve his state of mind. I despatched a courier to Mr. Wilson, at his farm, on Long Island, with a request that he would play Othello, to which he assented; and thus prepared, I made my appearance at rehearsal. The audience received the apology for the absence of Mr. Scott with very good humour. Naturally expecting it, Mr. Booth, who was to cause the disappointment, the play went on. Not much to my satisfaction, at the end of it, the audience called for Booth, who refused to go on; imposing upon me the necessity of making a second speech, and giving to Mr. Park Benjamin an opportunity of exercising his wit, by calling me in the newspaper, the tall gentleman in black, mourning the murder of his friend Roderigo; which part I had acted in the play, and the critics of Philadelphia used to say I acted it well. But there is no accounting for difference of taste; and when we are in Rome, we must do as Rome does; and the opinion of the editor of the New World is intitled to ———. Fill that space up to suit yourself, good reader.

This tragedy, which had been heralded as a combination of talent, with Booth, J. R. Scott, Wemyss, Shaw, Miss C. Oushman and Miss Clarendon, was the worst performance presented at the National Theatre, under Burton's management; and his friends, on his return from Philadelphia, did not forget to tell him of it. For a metropolitan theatre, it was disgraceful. Wilson's Othello put the audience to sleep; Booth's Iago was almost as bad; and Miss C. Oushman, as Emilia, and Shaw, as Claudio, was the only approach to acting seen upon the stage that evening.

At the close of Booth's engagements, Burton wisely replaced the "Naïad Queen" upon her throne. She fortunately proved again triumphant; but the hiatus in her reign had not been profitably filled, and had nearly overthrown her power, which yielded on the 24th of May, to "Semiramis—The Daughter of Air," a clever alteration of a play, by Burton, in which Laherwood painted some scenery which entitled him to be placed in the rank of the first artists. Miss Cushman also, took the city by surprise, in a part, which, if ■ had been written for her peculiar style, would ■ have hit the mark as well: to this part she is indebted for all the reputation she shortly gained throughout the United ■ was the stepping-stone to the ladder of fame she has rapidly mounted.

On the 28th of May, "Semiramis," and "Love, Law and Physic," was the performance, the last ■ took place within the walls of the ill-fated National Theatre. ■ afternoon of that day, as was my custom when I expected Burton, I walked down to the steamboat landing to await the arrival of the Philadelphia boat. On touching the wharf, I was joined by Burton; we walked up West Broadway, to Leonard Street, and as we entered the theatre, Mr. Oakley called me, and asked, "If that was Burton?" I said "Yes." "Do you know, Mr. Weyman, the theatre has been on fire?" "No; how long ago?" "Not ten minutes since." He pointed ■ attention to the place, and on examining the prompter's box, I ■ three distinct marks of fire in as many different positions. ■ them engaged, Shiers, the gas man, passed through from ■ interior of the house, with his torch not lighted; I said, "George, do you know anything about the theatre being on fire?" He treated the matter so lightly, hurrying past without even looking at the spot, which was the object of curiosity to every one else present, that when we discovered fire in more places than one, still burning, my suspicions were directed towards him. Burton, who had been talking to Oakley, now gave orders that all the doors should be shut, and said to me, "The man who did this is in the building now." "You go one way, I'll go the other; with a strict search we may find him." We had neither of us any suspicion of further danger. ■ We met at the painting room, and proceeding to the flies, I stopped suddenly and said, "Burton, I ■ fire here," he replied, "That's nothing: it proceeds from the scorched wood in the prompter's box just below you." "No, it's too strong for that—it comes in the direction of Wilson's rooms." While speaking, the door leading to these apartments was opened by Mr. Russell, who informed us they were on fire. The water closet had been fired; Wilson's desk, and many of his papers were on fire, while the room was littered up with old play bills and newspapers; down stairs fire was discovered under one of the ottomans in the Turkish saloon, with a box of lucifer matches, from which about one-third had been extracted, no doubt for the purpose of igniting waste paper wherever it might be found. The ticket-office belonging to the third tier was the last place where fire was discovered; making in all seven fires, which, in a few minutes longer, rendered all aid National Theatre vain. Mr. Smith, kept refectory under the theatre, brought me some matches, which, he stated, been window. This led to another search; marks which smouldered gone out, found room to bed-room. I by the police-office, when an officer, hearing particulars, questioned closely, who having any key would open the door leading Mr. Wilson's rooms; but upon trial, was found the key he used opened those doors readily. was in custody. The performance went on as if nothing had happened; watch was placed upon the premises, and all supposed to be safe. Burton and myself left the theatre together, resolving to return before went home for the night. We desired city watchmen, passed, to keep a bright look out for any suspicious character that might be seen lurking around. Between one and two o'clock we returned to the theatre, and found the watchmen and Mr. Russell on the alert. They reported all safe, and retired the night.

Between six and seven o'clock, Mr. Shaw came to my door, and desired to get up as quick as possible, the National Theatre in. I ordered a cab, I hurried my clothes, and arrived at corner of Leonard Street and Broadway with Shaw, just in time to hear, the roof fall in. The rapidity of the flames had been such, that scarcely an article could be saved. When the watchman left the building, he declares everything was safe; yet he had not proceeded to Broadway, when on looking towards the theatre, he saw flames issuing from the private room, the window in the upper range. Mr. H. Lewis was the first actor the spot belonging to the theatre, and on seeking the stage, prevented by Thomas Hurd, or Heard, a man in no way attached to the theatre, from entering; and thus Burton's property and my own, in the manager's room, which might have been saved, was doomed to destruction. examination, the police office, Heard, his trial. Why these two men, Shiers Heard, permitted to escape without trial, a mystery. Had I been placed Burton's situation, the investigation into the cause the destruction this theatre, should have been abandoned by until I had lost all power proceed remains enveloped in mystery, and a thousand conjectures, with rumours of all kinds, have assailed the reputation of several of the gentlemen who should, like Caesar's wife, have stood above suspicion. For my own part, I am fully convinced, if Heard had been tried, whether convicted or not, the truth would have been discovered, and the guilty brought to punishment. A clearer case of incendiarism was never brought to public notice; but who was the incendiary, or incendiaries, if more than one, is now a secret, which will descend with them to the grave.

This fire destroyed for me the few private dresses I yet retained from my whole stock, and made me, as an actor, a beggar indeed. On Sunday morning I started for Philadelphia, there to remain until summoned by Mr. Burton, to whom I was pledged until the 4th of July. How faithfully I redeemed that pledge, refusing every offer made to me, Mr. Dinneford, and others, can bear witness; and with surprise, although not anger, I received the intimation from Burton, that for the following year he intended to attend to the business of the stage himself, and would not make me an offer of the highest salary he should give to any one, as he considered it totally beneath my notice. I told him that was all I wished; I should take the Front Street Theatre, in Baltimore, the stockholders of which were only waiting for my arrangements with him to be brought to a close. "The very thing for you; go, and anything in the way of attraction I have, command freely. I have no doubt you will do well." And so we parted; and so remain the best of friends.

It is somewhat curious to remark that at this period the theatres in New-York were all at their lowest ebb;—the property of Mr. Simpson in the Park, advertised for sale, as under seizure for rent, by Messrs. Astor and Beckman;—his process in all probability intended as a protection, instead of an oppression to Mr. Simpson; the National burnt, and not likely to be re-built again; and the Bowery closed by an injunction for non-payment of license, on which subject Mr. Thomas Hamblin thus addressed his fellow-citizens:—

"BOWERY THEATRE CLOSED—By order of the Chancellor, on the complaint, and at the request of the managers of the society for the reformation of Juvenile delinquents.

TO MY FELLOW-CITIZENS,

"It is with the most painful feelings my duty compels me to announce to you, that the Bowery Theatre is closed, in obedience to a mandate from the Court of Chancery, issued out and served, at the instigation of the managers of the society, for the reformation of juvenile delinquents. Some nine years since the Legislature of this State inflicted a yearly tax of 500 dollars, on the performance of the Legitimate Drama, represented in the New York Theatre only; and on this law I have already paid upwards of 4000 dollars, which has been applied to the support and maintenance of juvenile thieves and other offenders.

"It will not surprise the public to be informed, that in these times of universal depression, I am unable to meet this demand on the instant, nor that I should solicit the indulgence usually granted in the other taxes. Last week I addressed a respectful letter to the above designated, soliciting a delay. To my astonishment, this reasonable request has been answered by a suit at law, and an injunction, commanding me to close my doors. Harsh and hasty as the measure is, I feel it nevertheless my duty to obey it. Like a good citizen, I shall bow to the majesty of the law, although 'I cannot kiss the rod that smites me.'

"I trust without offence, I may be permitted to regret the act, and question the necessity that may be thought to exist, for proceeding to such harsh legal measures, for the recovery of a tax due but on the 1st instant; more particularly when the complainants were aware that their proceedings would deprive most unexpectedly upwards of one hundred persons, employed in this establishment, of all means of obtaining bread in these times of universal distress. Armed for the present, with a little brief authority, the managers of the juvenile delinquents have struck a blow which must be severely felt by the honest and laborious persons in my employ, their wives and families; a blow which I think every feeling and manly heart will designate as uncalled for, unwarranted, impolitic and oppressive.

(Signed,)

"HARRIS."

TEANECK, 18, 1855

My friend Hamblin is a good general, he made capital of closing for one week; raised the ire (dander) of the Bowery boys, who would not stand their theatre being closed. They determined that Tom Hamblin should go ahead, and they pushed him ahead. He opened on the 24th, and played to better business than he had seen within the walls for two months. The burning down, removed the dangerous rivalry of Burton, who had compelled him to reduce his prices, and gave him once more a fair field of exertion, which he soon improved, and placed himself again in a position free from pecuniary embarrassment.

In bidding adieu once more to New York, I leave it with a hope to return some day and take up my residence there. My prejudices in favour of Philadelphia have been removed, and I am compelled to admit that New York is the first city in the Union for business of every kind. Different expressions these to those that may be found in the earlier part of this work; but "a wise man corrects error, while a fool perishes in his folly."

On board the boat, which carried me to Philadelphia, I met Miss Cushman; the burning of the theatre, and the proceedings of the previous day, were of course the topics of conversation. Her suspicions pointed to me as yet unimpeached, who could have no motive for such a malicious act.

On my arrival in Philadelphia, Mr. B. tendered me the Arch Street Theatre, for a benefit in the name of himself and his partner, Jones. Mr. Lewis Pratt offered me the Chesnut Street for the same purpose; and lastly, after much prompting, Dinneford offered the Walnut. Here I confess, I would rather have received condolence, and with a better chance of success. However, I accepted the first offer, had hosts of volunteers; and on the 10th of June, had the mortification to find that an actor really in want should never be patronised. A few dollars would have been most acceptable, but the citizens of Philadelphia were not disposed at this time to give them to me; I lost money by the benefit of condolence. On the 17th, Miss Charlotte Cushman, with the aid of a committee of arrangement, at the Chestnut Street Theatre, did far much better; and Burton on the 19th, at his own theatre, was made to feel how little sympathy the misfortunes of managers or actors find from the great body of our citizens. It would be difficult to find three standing higher with the public in professional reputation than Miss C. Cushman, Mr. Burton, and Mr. Wemyss; yet on each occasion they were mortified that they should have been induced to make attempts which proved so abortive. Vanitas, vanitatis, et omnia exilis!

XXXIX.

Opening of the Front Street Theatre, and Engagement. Charles Eaton, another Temperance Man. "The Manager in Distress." Good Joke. Liberality, characteristic of Sailors. and the piece. "London The Press, its Assumptions, and Treatment of Actors."

I COMMENCED my season at the Front Street Theatre, in Baltimore, on Monday, the 6th of September, 1841. The directors had thought proper to let it to Mr. Ward for a short time, and he gave me havoc to do among the scenery and properties; to replace which put me to much trouble and inconvenience, and the stockholders to some expense. The opening pieces were, "Carpenter of Rouen," and "Simpson & Co."—the company, Wemyss, Matthews, Phillips, Thorne, Ash, Eddy, Brittenham, Kimbor, Newton, Brennan and Bowers, Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. D. Anderson, Miss Matthews, Helen Matthews; to whom were afterwards added, Harrison, D'Angelia, Mr. and Mrs. Smith, Wesver, Lyne, Clemans, Williams, Kytinge, Gourlay, and four ballet girls. The first was the Hungarian Singers, followed by A. Adams, whom I knew for years. He played an excellent engagement, but in the renewal, his old failing ruined our rising reputation:—would he were dead, without benefit of clergy, for an actor to appear on the stage drunk. On the 2nd of October I perpetrated a play of horror, in attempting to make a tragedy into a drama, under the title of "Three Witches of Heath." If it had not succeeded, at least it gave me an idea of what might be done with the play by the judicious introduction of pageantry, by which I shall profit hereafter. On the 3rd of October, a play, titled "The Black Knight," possessing some merit, was written by a gentleman belonging to the press, was produced. What fits might have been if the citizens of Baltimore had given it a hearing, cannot now be guessed. Curiosity, a little inclination, to support an American author, exhibited on this occasion, the receipts were only forty-four dollars and fifty cents! damping the spirits of author, actors, and manager—the worst of the season. On the following night the receipts were doubled, the audience appeared much gratified, and the author's night might have produced a tolerable house, but the first night cooled his ardour, and he declined the risk of further mortification. On the 9th of October, Booth and Adams played in "Othello;" after which they appeared in "Venice Preserved," "Jane Shore," "Pizarro," and "Douglas." Charles Eaton, another temperance man, played a very good engagement singly, beating the two great tragedians who preceded him. Eaton was always popular to a certain class. Poor fellow, he went from Baltimore to Pittsburgh, where he met his mortal career, having, in a fit of intoxication, walked ballustrading of the Exchange Hotel, falling eighteen or twenty feet, and being picked up with broken bones; he breathed but lived a few hours, but never spoke of the accident.

On the 10th of November, for my benefit, I produced "Zantha," a play of five dollars, with "The Manager in Distress;" during the performance of which, many persons, imposed upon by the seeming reality, vacated their seats, in compliance with my address, and applied at the box office for the return of their money, but he laughed at for their credulity, losing good seats to their chance of catching a glimpse of the stage from the dress boxes, as best they might. The joke had almost ended in earnest; it was some time before the officers of the theatre recovered their good humour. It was almost that, in Baltimore, where theatres have existed for fifty years, the citizens could have been practised upon: the joke was a force for many years: and enjoyed it more than dupes themselves, when the feeling of anger had passed. A celebrated dancer, Madame Romanini, added to the attraction of the Bal Masque, in "Zantha."

astonishing the good people of Baltimore by the agility of her movements.

This was a season of wonders, in Baltimore. While playing "Jane Shore," an unsophisticated son of the Ocean was so wrapt up in the play that, as Mrs. Phillips lay down to die in the last scene, of want, suddenly sprang over the boxes, and with the activity of a cat, placed himself at her side upon the stage, saying he would be damned if any woman should starve in that manner while he had a shot in the locker; and he actually insisted upon forcing upon her the contents of his purse. An explanation ensued, and he was conducted back to his seat in the boxes, where the audience gave him three cheers; and I shall never forget the honest smile that lighted his weather-beaten face. He was the magnet of the evening for the remainder of the evening, although he had turned the last act of the tragedy into a farce highly relished by the audience.

On the 1st of November, A. attempted Richelieu. The fame acquired by E. Forrest, in this part should have stimulated his pride;—drunk had done its work—the mind of the actor is gone; he is incapable of committing a new part to memory: there was not even an attempt to produce effect; a school boy who should have read the play as a task, and read so badly, would have been whipped. The conclusion, the feeling of the audience was not one of pity, but contempt; a number of those present, hissed; the respect for what he had been, restrained the majority from joining in this insult. I know of but one very small consolation, his friend Booth, butchered this part more cruelly; he was laughed at—Addams despised. There was $54 dollars in the house; he repeated the part on the following evening to $2 dollars; further comment is useless.

Mr. Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam played an excellent engagement, terminating on the 10th of December. Reports now reached me, from Philadelphia, that Burton's pecuniary embarrassments increased so fast, it would be impossible for him to keep his theatre open; that his scenery, wardrobe and other property, was under seizure for rent, to be sold by the sheriff. This actually took place; Mr. Newton becoming the purchaser, and Mr. Burton being allowed to proceed, under a new arrangement with Mr. Wharton, the ground landlord, giving him one chance more to recover his losses.

On Monday, the 18th of December, "London Assurance," which Madame Vestris, by the aid of furniture alone, had made successful; and which, for a few nights, revived the drooping fortunes of every theatre in which it was acted, was produced at the Front Street Theatre, in Baltimore, in a style which will be remembered as long as comedy is talked about at all. I played it fourteen nights, ten of which were in succession; the weather was very inclement, hail, rain, snow and frost, yet the house was well attended; if the clerk of the weather-office had been my friend, its success would have been equal to my expectations. My friend Tom Lynn, was I indebted for the copy, although in a few days afterwards I received a marked London Book, from Mr. Meadows, of Covent Garden. Samuel Butler was the next star, and then the horses in "Rockwood" and "Masopha."

Miss Clifton took the Holiday Street Theatre, which had during the winter been without a tenant, and on Monday the 1st of January, announced to open it in conjunction with W. E. Burton. To Mr. Burton the speculation at the Holiday Street was the final act in the drama of his management. I had been open one hundred and twenty-seven nights, on the 31st of January, 1842, when I contrived all engagements—actors paid in full of all demands—not by signing receipts to that effect, receiving money—all the demands of the season, out of doors, discharged, when Mr. Burton, who had promised me every assistance, but refused every request for pieces, &c., that I made to him, appeared in person to open the theatre as manager. In the first week, Mr. M. Cushman, and Chippendale, I received only 166 dollars; Chippendale's benefit amounting 166 dollars, Charlotte Cushman's 166 dollars: this was a blow, but the week was 166 dollars being the amount of the week, or 47 dollars per night for the two weeks, in which the Holiday Street Theatre had been playing to tolerable houses. Finding I could not support this conflict, I called General Walsh to my aid, and placed the horses in my circus, first giving a Dress Ball in honour of Washington's Birth Day, on the 22nd of February. If I had cause for exultation in the commencement, the horses had the power to draw away all his customers but those represented by that curse to all theatres, the tickets. He retreated from Baltimore, routed and dismayed, leaving his actors to find their way out of the city in the best way they could, his own fortunes completely prostrated, only to be relieved by the benefit of the Insolvent Court, or Bankrupt Act. On the 4th of April, the horses having succeeded in vanquishing the foe, I again opened the theatre. Mr. Proctor, whom I ought never to have announced as star, fixed the fate of the season. On the night of his benefit he was so intoxicated, I was compelled to commence an audience. Even the grand encampment, commenced on the 1st of May, was, by bad weather, rendered unavailable. Governor Porter and suite of Pennsylvania, and Governor Thomas and suite of Maryland, could not induce the ladies to turn out through torrents of rain, and the encamped [redacted] looked like as many half-drowned mudarks. I stayed on the 23d of May, but cannot now say all the bills were paid. Printers, actors, officers, even musicians, were in arrear.

[redacted] Thomas Wildey, Colonel Myer, [redacted] Hyde, [redacted] Sanderson, form a pattern worthy of imitation, [redacted] a hoard of agents, always willing to aid instead of crushing their lessee. In any difficulty in which I was placed as [redacted] manager of [redacted] Front Street Theatre, I [redacted] for [redacted] advice or pecuniary aid, that it was not given, [redacted] cheerfully. [redacted] those gentlemen, and the other members of [redacted] board, I [redacted] grateful thanks, not only for favours received, but for offers of greater magnitude, offered, but declined by me, because I could not see the justice of placing these gentlemen in a position which might have compelled [redacted] to [redacted] many of my debts, as a reward for their kindness, [redacted] the good opinion they entertain of me both as a man [redacted] a manager. It is a proud satisfaction to me, in surrendering [redacted] theatre into their hands, [redacted] know that they appreciate the motives which guided me in [redacted] determination.

I [redacted] now arrived at the time when my friend Joe Cowell [redacted] world he found me in a "cellar," (and a very comfortable basement it was,) selling pills and periodicals, where, could I have commanded a little more money to have continued my system of advertisements, I should have done well enough, but the funds did not come in [redacted] enough, and the moment I ceased to advertise on a large scale, a very [redacted] purse would contain all my receipts. This [redacted] me, in a [redacted] point of view, [redacted] influence [redacted]

THE PRESS.

Generally upon [redacted] subjects connected with [redacted] daily [redacted] life, I know that I [redacted] approach a tender subject—one which, like a hornet's nest, the more you [redacted] it, the greater number of stings will [redacted] upon you. No man [redacted] been [redacted] to editors of newspapers [redacted] I have, and few have had more abuse heaped upon them from a similar source, or have been at times more harshly treated. My object, therefore, [redacted] to direct [redacted] of my readers, most of whom I presume are [redacted] the theatre, to the manner [redacted] which the press is subsidised to deceive them; but let them speak upon this subject for themselves.

[redacted] bears date, Philadelphia, April 2nd, [redacted]
[redacted] :-

(CONT.)

"With a view to avoid some of the inconveniences which result from a diversity in the charges of advertising in the several newspaper establishments in this city, the publishers of the daily papers have recently adopted a scale of prices by which it is their intention hereafter to regulate. It has, therefore, been thought due to you, as well as to themselves, to present for your consideration the following item which relates to theatres, circuses, and other places of amusement and we take the liberty of suggesting, that the 1st of the present month presents a suitable period for commencing this arrangement.

"Amusements.—On bills of performance of theatres, circuses, &c., not exceeding one square per night, shall be charged two dollars per week; and no card of any person shall be inserted on any other terms than those of the regular rates. For all communications to the publishers as advertisements, by the square, at the same prices.

JASPER HARDING,
MUFFLIN PARRY,
N. SARGENT,
J. B. CHANDLER,

WM. FRY,
EDWARD CONRAD,
Z. POLLMAN,
HAY & Co.

"To F. C. WEMYSS, Manager."

At this period there was an agreement with those newspapers which I advertised, to insert the daily advertisement of the Theatre, for sixty dollars per week. The gentlemen, in the plenitude of their power, on the day for this arrangement, one day antecedent to the publication of their printed card, Mr. Joseph R. Chandler, being the only one who qualified the notice, as not to involve a breach of previous contract. Instead of the first of the present month, the notice ran—at the expiration of existing contracts, was honestly done, and he himself, although he was enabled by his position and influence the new arrangement.

The continued puffing fostered by this system has had a malignant influence upon the interests of the theatre, and still worse upon the private character of the actor; enabled him to place before the public a claim of respectability who in former times would not have been tolerated beyond a first appearance.

There was a time when the opinion of a well-educated man (whose refinement of taste in classic literature rendered him capable of writing a criticism both upon the merits of the author and actor) was received by the latter with deference; his faults judiciously pointed out, induced him to apply a remedy, while praise from the same source urged him on to future improvement. The pit, then frequented by men whose judgment the actor must relied upon—whose censure they dreaded—whose good opinion they courted, and who decided, viva voce, upon their merits, during [redacted] performance of a part—these opinions the press echoed, rarely modifying, and from which decision, so confirmed, [redacted] actor had no appeal. This power the press has lost over the mind of the actor, [redacted] knows that for a few dollars he can have his own opinion [redacted] his abilities paraded in the newspapers, to procure fame at a distance from the circle where his merit is known and [redacted] It is the actor's pocket, not his mind, that is taxed. "How much will it cost to enable me to travel through the United States as a star?" That is the calculation—not, have I the ability to maintain such a position—but have I the money to secure it by the puff preliminary in certain widely-circulated newspapers. The success, like that of all quacks—depends upon the constant iteration of puffs upon merit, which has no existence but in the columns of these purchased newspapers.

Again, how frequently a critique upon the able manner in which an actor has supported a principal character, appears in the newspapers, when no such performance ever took place, some accident causing a change of pieces, the knowledge of which never reached the reporter, whose article was in type, although he had not been at the theatre during the evening—and, when discovered, who thinks of it beyond the momentary laugh raised against the editor, thus caught in a trap, except some minor actor who, having been unceremoniously abused for acting badly a part he never appeared in, is silly enough to seek an explanation or demand an apology which, if given, is couched in such language as to be more offensive than the original paragraph. Who has forgotten a certain gentleman belonging to the Chestnut Street Theatre, who, indignant at being termed "a thing," instead, upon an apology from the editor, which being promised, appeared, the following morning, thus—"Mr. — called upon us, and requested we would correct the statement of yesterday, wherein, speaking of his merit as an actor, we called him 'a thing.' We sincerely ask his pardon, and thus publicly inform our readers, that Mr. —, of the Chestnut Street is No Thing." The wit of this is no apology for its baseness; but it is a fair specimen of such redress as actors feel for such offences.

There are found low minded men in all trades and professions. When a manager [redacted] a low-minded editor, his intolerance is intolerable. I can quote an instance in which an editor, having been excluded from the free list for a long course of unprovoked abuse and hostility towards a theatre where he was an invited guest, had the impertinence on the following morning to ask in the column of his own paper, which he termed the medium of the press, by whose authority he was refused: he would show the arbitrary manager, "the liberty of the press" was not to be controlled by the press, politically, should be free as air; it is the guard of liberty, defending the rights of the governed against the governors: but the right of a private citizen to destroy the peace of his family, by the chains of adamant. The right has who, who is fortunate in pecuniary his neighbour, who command money sufficient to publish printed sheets daily, in form of a newspaper, to utter expressions of news, to provoke a breach of the peace, and which, uttered in the presence of the aggrieved party, would subject him to personal chastisement? I ask, what right has such a man to shield himself from the consequence of an act, under "the liberty of the press?" But! is the tyranny of the press—a worse tyranny than any despot ever exercised, the fear of which is felt in the jury-box and on the bench. The libel is no protection to a citizen from such as I have described. The jury agree, legal prosecutions expensive; and if, surmounting all these difficulties, a citizen a verdict, the judge the mildest permits to record, and himself from abuse, which he has launched against him for the discharge of an unpleasant duty. The convicted editor, in the first sheet which follows the sentence, triumphantly records the result, in which he probably with truth, the character of the prosecutor was valued by the court and jury as per cent, which Lord Byron says, these gentlemen always use for I paid, and with the gentleman joy of opinion fellow-citizens of him. This is the law affords a defenceless man against one armed with a daily press to assault. I ask one who has been bold enough to tell these self-constituted censors morals and all his actions, they should not shield him with impunity, and appeals to the law to suppress the aggression, whether this be not a true picture of the result! But reverses the case. Let a citizen, goaded by repeated insult, commit an assault and battery upon the sacred person of an editor, he will find the law, which will be resorted to, has the power not only to fine but imprison him, while the judge, in pronouncing sentence, will read him a homily upon the enormity of his offence, and assure him that the court is determined at all hazards to protect the liberty of the press.

As a source of advertising business, a newspaper is invaluable to the community, and is now extensively used by all wish to prosper; but why the proprietor a popular for this purpose should claim the right, by virtue of the liberty of the press, to regulate all places of public amusement to which they demand free admission, under the penalty of refusing to notice them in the reading matter, and sometimes even refusing to insert the paid-for advertisement, unless accompanied by tickets for the editor, is a practice subversive of the restriction the should exercise (if all) these very places of amusement, all of which are legalized until it cannot pay his advertising bill; and then his place of amusement, already tottering, is doomed to certain destruction. Now let me show the amount of money which tickets demanded and given by a theatre would produce, if paid for, as they should be, if the editor charges for advertising:

The proprietor, a season ticket, valued at minimum price, 15 dollars; reporter, ditto, 15 dollars; editor, ditto, 15 dollars; order 4 every Saturday—this is to the devil and the journeymen at manager's expense. All have been submitted to, rather provoke the ire of an And these orders, which in the to 2 dollars, have actually at doors, stopping the money which would have been paid the treasury for must do the proprietors justice say, last arrangement met with disapprobation; but the to the theatre remained unabated—the request for orders was on following Saturday. I have shown that each paper received one hundred and forty-nine in the year, over and above the two hundred and eight for puffs and advertisements, with the extra cards actors' benefits, amounting at least fifty Now twelve newspapers daily, enjoy these privileges, theatres open, it follows, that the (excluding the fair business part of the transaction, in paying advertisements and puffs) of seven thousand one hundred and fifty-two dollars is annually paid by the theatres of Philadelphia, to purchase the good will of the gentlemen who direct the liberty of the press, which, with the receipts for advertising, &c., amount to nineteen thousand one hundred and fifty-two dollars. A great deal has been said about black mail: is a private affair, altogether independent of the management; if exist, the actor or his friends pay that; but, certainly, nobody will doubt freedom of the reading chapter, in its supervision public

The following, written by Leigh Hunt, of the London Examiner, nearly fifty years ago, forms so good a glossary of reporters, that I cannot avoid transcribing them:—

A crowded house.—A theatre, on the night of a performance when all the back seats and upper boxes are empty.

A good actor.—The general term for an actor who gives good dinner.

A fine actor.—One who makes a great noise: a tatterdemallion of passions: a clap-trapper: one intended by nature for a towncrier.

A charming play.—A play of dancing, music, and scenery: a play in which the author has the less to do the better.

Great applause.—Applause, mixed with the hiss of the pit and the gallery.

Unbounded and universal applause.—Applause which comes from the pit only. The phrase is frequently used at the bottom of the play-bills, declaring the reception a new piece has met with.

Leigh Hunt certainly have had before "the vision" of the Philadelphia newspaper critics, making allowance for progressive improvement in the art of puffing.

XL.

Opening of the Pittsburgh Theatre, by Dinwiddie. A failure.

Persons. Mr. Tasistro in Hamlet. Fanny Brown. Miss Jane Brown. Tom Flynn. Riley and Sons. A. Warton Act. End of the Season of 1841-42.

DINWIDDIE, who had become lessee of the Arch Street Theatre, opened the winter campaign of 1841, on the 7th of August, with "Pizarro," and "Simpson and Co." His business for several months very good; but, as usual with the Arch property, he was a promise of success, to be succeeded by failure and abandonment. He produced "Bookworm," "Bronze Horse," &c.; finally departed for Pittsburgh, where he had been so disastrous to me, notwithstanding Slomana, Mr. Jones, Brough, Madame Otto, Miss Lee, (with La Bayaders,) Eaton, J. Finn—all put forward claims to the support of the Pittsburghers. The weather was so inclement, that the stars, both from the east and west, met half frozen at the top of the Alleghany mountains, which was the barrier beyond which none could proceed for three weeks. Mr. Jackson, the present proprietor of the Bowery, was the manager. The theatre was open for seventy-two nights, the average receipts sixty-two dollars!! which, deducting the money paid to stars and actors for benefits, would make the treasury receipts about forty dollars. For the first time since the theatre was built, the actors returned to Philadelphia and Baltimore, with a balance due to them for salary, which was afterwards paid; at least one half the company were arrested, and bailed my friend, George Beale, who started them on me as [redacted] of chased actors from the [redacted] Theatre. [redacted] was the second losing [redacted] Pittsburgh. The weather, and my own folly in yielding to the wishes of a few, in converting [redacted] pit into a parquette, (which the gallery were determined should not be so occupied in peace, fearing every one who took a seat in it, until [redacted] was replaced as a pit,) were the chief causes in bidding [redacted] to the theatre, which I made several attempts again to occupy. I bade farewell to the last link which had any hold upon my regard as a manager. My old Pittsburgh friends condescend to call upon me when business brings them to Philadelphia, and we laugh at the happy times we have passed within the walls of the now smoky palace—the Pittsburgh Theatre, to which, and its proprietor, Mr. E. Simpson, I wish success, most sincerely hoping that [redacted] may repay to him all losses he has sustained by others, as well as myself.

Burton opened his National Theatre on Saturday, the 21st of August, disappointing [redacted] on [redacted] first night, Conner being unable to proceed with [redacted] play of "Money." I was called upon to act Belmont, which I did cheerfully to oblige Burton. On Monday, the 23rd, E. Forrest commenced an engagement. How [redacted] runs from one theatre to [redacted] other, [redacted] the fox, doubling, until he reaches his [redacted] ground again; more attractive by his temporary absence. It is a dangerous experiment, which his popularity [redacted] him to pursue with success.

Burton produced "London Assurance," on the 15th of November, with Browne, himself, Buckstone, Miss Clifton, and Mrs. Fitzwilliam, five stars, determined to eclipse the Walnut Street, where Flynn had been too quick for him. He added an aviary of living birds, and fountains of real water, to the [redacted] attractions of [redacted] and properties; and thus closed the year 1841.

[redacted] Street Theatre, still languished [redacted] the management of Mr. Pratt, Mr. Dinmore having retired, opened for the season with "Much Ado about Nothing," and "Faint Heart never won Fair Lady," on the 28th of August. On the 31st, Mr. Tuzistro, a gentleman well known in the literary world, attempted to act Hamlet. He can handle his pen much better in a newspaper paragraph, than he could guide his tongue upon the stage through such a part. What is there so terrific in those foot-lights, which tongue-tie the most loquacious who appear before them, while those behind them see no difficulty in the player's art! Let them try it,

Mr. Tadiaro, and they will be more lenient in their strictures upon you.

On the 1st of September, the "queen of dances," Fanny Ellsler, appeared in "La Sylphide," then La Bayadere; but all in vain—the novelty was the attraction which, could enable a manager to pay such exorbitant terms, ceased; this last engagement, bringing the Chestnut nearer to the which now predict.—Richings attempted to revive of very comedies; but now, alas! no in Philadelphia appreciate such plays; and was a waste of money, for no good. "Barnaby Rudge" was next tried; but this theatre, and never, as the principal attraction—the scenery, stage, and machinery, want modern improvement, before, in this, any compete with the Walnut Street Theatre, where every thing is perfect for such pieces. On the 5th of October, Miss Jane Sloman appeared as a pianist; she did not produce the expected. A the place for such an exhibition, which belongs to the concert-room. Mr. and Mrs. Sloman performed on the same evening, but the house was not worthy the occasion: took place on the 21st, the Ravel Family attract even money enough to defray expenditure; and on 11th of October, theatre season—a very short, and very unprofitable one—with Richings' benefit. Alas! poor Chestnut, Barton has your doom, dragging himself down in the ruin he has visited him.

On the 1st of August, the Walnut opened under the management of Flynn, Marshall the loss, with a new piece—a of "Undine" the "Naiad Queen"—entitled the "Water Queen." It failed, and merited its fate, the transparent sea being the only redeeming feature in the piece; tiring the audience, until their patience was exhausted; and half of them left the theatre before the great scene was brought before them. If Flynn failed in this, he shortly verted a defeat into a triumph, by producing the "Naiad Queen," and throwing down the gauntlet to Burton,—making great noise about this piece, when he was quietly preparing "London Assurance;" and took both Burton and the city by surprise, on the 6th of November, by a display of carpets, cushions, pianos, candelabra, chairs, tables, flower-pots, and statues—all real: played the comedy without the assistance of a star, and took the gold off the gingerbread, while the two other houses in Chestnut Street were dreaming upon the possibility of getting it ready. Had Flynn done nothing more during the season, the tact he displayed in this, proved his capacity to manage the theatre in a manner most likely to success. Burton, with all his energy, could not recover the blow, and the theatre of the Chestnut Street returning money to his treasury. As to Mr. Pratt and Mr. Richings, they seem to have gone to sleep; and after Mr. Burton and Marshall left the city with a lot of "Insurance," they announced the Chestnut Street Theatre as a play, throwing away a great deal of dollars, and the chance of any return to the treasury.

The Arch Theatre opened, under the management of Mr. Charles Porter, of the American Theatre, in contradistinction to the Walnut, which leaves out the article; and soon tired of such folly, Mr. Porter resumed the title of Arch Street Theatre. It commenced on the 1st of March, and lingered till the 4th of July; the only reason for having introduced upon the stage was Bixley, since so well known to fame in Europe. His performance here merely termed neat—so neat to him, it produced a fortune net. He has many imitators, but no successful competitor. His performance is both pleasing and elegant; the ease with which the boys accomplish astonishing feats is to the pleasure as the beauty of the audience.

The National Theatre, under Burton, closed on the 26th of January, 1842, never again to open as "his" theatre. It proceeded to Baltimore, where it was driven into the street that to bury all ambitious hopes of being alone the director of dramatics in the city of Philadelphia. The beautiful scenery was wantonly destroyed; chopped in pieces, to prevent it falling into other hands; and whether done by Burton or Newton, or by both, Mr. Burton's reputation as a manager severely, without attaining the object; for Welsh and Newton converted it into a splendid Circus and Amphitheatre, in a short time the destruction, intended to have been complete, was perpetrated. Welsh and Newton have reaped the harvest which Burton planted; and ruin is the source of emolument. There is also a story, which is the result of judicial proceedings, in which, against the artist, of wantonly destroying the newly-painted scenery, in the Holiday Theatre, and more, by priming it over with smudge, and also against Mr. Newton, for so carelessly ripping out certain gas fixtures underneath the stage, as to endanger the safety of the house. The artist escaped by pleading orders received to prepare the canvas for repainting in some new piece, which prevented its appearance, and the manager's conduct became the subject of discussion. Miss Clifton also, who appears, only lent her name for the purpose of obtaining the theatre for Burton, but [redacted] was never [redacted] in the proceeds, was summoned, to [redacted] for certain unpaid bills, which it is to be hoped, [redacted] teach [redacted] prudence for [redacted] future. [redacted] was per-[redacted] unite [redacted] with Pratt at [redacted] Chestnut Street, and, by acting in concert, to save [redacted] theatres. [redacted] amount of money agreed [redacted] furnished by the former gentleman, [redacted] speedily swallowed up in the [redacted] sustained; and Marshall, frightened from the course, wisely resolved [redacted] devote [redacted] attention entirely to the Walnut Street. Dr. Lardner commenced [redacted] scientific lectures, with great success; [redacted] Pratt announced, on the 2nd of March, 1842, that he [redacted] [redacted] a coalition with W. E. Burton, [redacted] with a double compo-

[redacted] open Old Drury, with the play of "Money," and [redacted] of "State Secrets." This alliance offensive and defensive, between the belligerents, [redacted] ruined in the contest, [redacted] too late. Nothing could [redacted] either [redacted] or [redacted] theatres, [redacted] both in [redacted] agonies of death. Hackett, [redacted] Forrest, Miss Clifton, Signor [redacted] Boguis, all lent their aid [redacted] vain. [redacted] theatre closed its short season, passing out of the hands of Mr. Pratt, who had been engaged in the management from the commencement of the partnership of Maywood and Co., in 1833; and thus ended the eventful [redacted] of 1841-2, [redacted] which all the theatres supported themselves longer without the aid of any European star (newly imported) [redacted] had happened for twenty years. To this cir-
[redacted] is to be attributed the downfall of the Chestnut Street Theatre, [redacted] the failure of Burton at the National. [redacted] Walnut can always do without this foreign aid, and the Arch Street never will do, with or without it, for a longer period than [redacted] season, under any [redacted] manager.

[redacted] XII.

The Era of Permanent Government. Mr. and Mrs. Brougham. [redacted] a la Muzano at the [redacted] Street. Charles Thomas at the O.lympic. The Black Raven. The [redacted] of the Lady Managers. [redacted] [redacted] The author opens the Olympic. Forrest and Mayready. Letter of [redacted] to the Editor of the Common Times. The Right [redacted]

I now record [redacted] era of pettifogging government; and as the [redacted] is now governed, directly or indirectly, let sovereign man say what he pleases in denial, I see no reason why the [redacted] should not be placed directly under the influence of the fair [redacted] [redacted] Street Theatre was opened on the 7th of September, 1842, by Miss Mary Maywood, [redacted] lessee;

and as the stockholders had attributed the unpopularity of their theatre to the mismanagement of Robert Campbell Maywood, it was but a just triumph that they should offer him this lease, as the only person they could think to the wisely all responsibility, placing daughter head of the establishment, assuming management only. The first performance the new arrangement was the "Man of World," the Secrets: the company—Richings, stage manager; Maywood, acting manager; W. B. Wood, Andrews, Matthews, Thomas Placide, Charles, Stanley, Watson, Eberle, Jervis, Bowers, Godden, Hines, Henrie, Perring, and Kelly, the prompter; Misses Maywood, Ayres, Matthews, Jones, Thompson, Norman, Seale, George; Madames J. G. Porter (Miss Duff), Maywood, Charles, Thomas and Rogers.

To checkmate this move, Mr. Marshall, on the 22nd of September, Walnut theatre opened, under the direction of Charlotte Cushman, the Stratagem, and "A Nabob for Hour." I regret have no of the company.

The of the rival queens Dr. Lardner, the Chestnut Street Theatre, with "Historical of the Revolution," and "Tableaux Vivants," John with "Sixteen-string Jack," the "Golden Farmer," at the Walnut Theatre. On the 17th of October, Miss Maywood received the powerful aid of Madame Celeste, while Miss Cushman offered, on the same night, in opposition, Mr. E. Forrest, at the Walnut Street Theatre. On the 31st of October, Mr. and Mrs. Brougham made their first appearance, the lady as Lady Teasle in the "School for Scandal," and Mrs. Fitzgig in the "Irish Lion." She was a very beautiful woman, but, as an actress, inferior to any one I call to mind as a leading stock actress in any of our large theatres. Her success was greater than her pretensions entitled her to, but most unsatisfactory to herself—but vanity must sometimes meet with rebuke. Of her husband I am prepared to speak in a far different strain. Mr. Brougham is the best representative of Irish characters who has ventured to appear since the loss of poor Power; and even in Tim Moore, which Power rendered so irresistible, he made a most favourable impression on the audience, retaining to this moment their good will whenever he appeared before them. He was the original Dazzle in the play of "London Assurance," and as a light comedian he possesses the first great requisite—he looks and moves like a gentleman upon the stage, a quality in which most of our actors are very deficient; he has, likewise, all the spirit necessary to support the sprightly dialogue of a comedy. I do not think his starring engagements have aided his purse, but they have given him popularity, which will for ever render him a most valuable member of a good stock company—while in Irishmen, he may occasionally indulge, as a star, with success.

On the 5th of December, Mr. and Mrs. Seguin, and Mr. Shrivall, commenced the longest opera season by an English company, during which they produced "The Mummy in Egypt," and only suspended their performances for a few nights, on account of the domestic calamity of the Seguin, in the death of two children, by scarlet fever; until the 17th of February, when a complimentary benefit was given to Mrs. Seguin, whose worth as a woman, no less than her talent as a singer, deserved, under the circumstances, such an expression of feeling by the ladies of Philadelphia. The performances were "Norma," and "Zampa," two of the best operas which the troupe acted, and the receipts were worthy of the occasion. I must not forget to mention, that on the 27th of January, 1843, the "Stabat Mater" was produced at the Chestnut Street Theatre; first and second parts supported by Mr. Seguin, Mr. Shrivall, Mr. Richings, Mr. Archer, Mrs. Seguin, Mrs. Bailey, and Miss Coad. The Chestnut Street Theatre closed for the season with Mrs. Seguin's benefit. The receipts of this opera season, which must have paid the stars, does not appear to have satisfied the fair managers, whose unpaid bills and actors' salaries became, thus early, a source of annoyance. She published a very foolish card in the newspapers stating the sum received by the opera troupe, and the amount lost by the theatre. The object was to excite sympathy or commiseration, but failed to produce either. Could she have done better, she would not have pursued the engagement, and few stars, (Booth and Jim Crow only can I call to recollection,) ever give one cent of their demand, in favour of the theatre they may join; but to which, when the engagements are formed, they are expected to attract not only money enough to pay their engagement, but to yield a handsome surplus to the treasury. If they fail to do this, the public will only laugh at the manager for any complaint he may be foolish enough to utter, either in play-bills or in newspapers, both famous for the truth of their assertions!

On the 13th of May, Miss Maywood attempted to retrieve lost ground, by fitting up the Chestnut Street Theatre as a grand Promenade, and giving Concerts a la Muzard. The statues, the shrubbery, and the fountain were of good taste; but the orchestra, placed in the centre of the stage, destroyed all the effect, broke the charm of the scene on the very threshold; and, in attempting to promenade, a lady and gentleman could scarcely pass abreast of this ill-shaped lumbering band, which was under the direction of Mr. Watson, Bellini Smith, Mrs. Watson, Miss Clarence Wells, Mr.

Oliphugh, Misses Cummings, and not least, the Hon pianist, Mr. [redacted]. All proved failures; the fashionables made their appearance on the first night, and, to speak technically, the thing did not take. Miss Maywood kept it thirty-three nights, the [redacted] diminishing every week, and finally closed, to [redacted] the theatre, on the [redacted] July, [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] the stockholders [redacted] dictata.

On the [redacted] of January, 1843, Mr. Charles Thorne, of [redacted] Theatre, in New York, opened Walsh's Olympic Theatre, (late Burton's National,) with "Hercules and the Swan," "Hell Upon Earth," and "Kill or Cure." The very title of the second piece was enough to startle the citizens, and raise a hue [redacted] cry [redacted] the morality of the drama. However clever [redacted] piece might be, it was [redacted] injudicious [redacted] [redacted] an opening night. [redacted] appeared here as a star. Right—that my friend is the proper way to redeem your fortune. Your [redacted] [redacted] actor is appreciated and sought after; abandon all thoughts of management, [redacted] five years [redacted] you in a better condition than when you commenced your alteration of Cooke's Circus. Whether the atmosphere of this house rendered him petulant, or Mr. Thorne [redacted] not yield that courtesy which every manager should show to a brother [redacted] in distressed and broken circumstances, or Burton really neglected his rehearsals, [redacted] alleged, he refused to go on with his engagement, and on [redacted] 13th of January, I find him announced at the Walnut Street, with Booth and Hill, in "Town and Country." Thorne, in one week, abandoned the city, leaving actors, carpenters, &c., to shift for themselves.

Miss Charlotte Cushman, like Miss Mary Maywood, discovered that they were out of their proper sphere of action; that the energy of a Madame Vestris, the only female who [redacted] successfully conducted a theatre, did not belong to either of them. W. H. Blake relieved Miss Cushman, at the Walnut, [redacted] following [redacted]; and, divested of the cares [redacted] annoyances of management, she surprised Mr. Macready, by the vigour of her performance in the Queen, [redacted] "Hamlet," Lady Macbeth, &c., which opened to her present good [redacted] and high reputation.

What has become of the Arch Street all this time, is scarcely worthy of notice, but for the fact that Mr. Porter associated Mr. Pratt, so ungenerously ousted by his former friend and partner, Maywood, from all participation in the management of Old Drury. But it required longer heads and stronger purses than P. & P. possess, to make any thing of such a hopeless property. Pratt retired, and the doors were as usual closed long before the period a season should be brought to its regular conclusion. A Mr. Samuel was the next lessee, who strange to say, is reported to have made money—if he did, is the wisest man who ever entered the doors for—he kept it, refusing to pay his actors. One lady [redacted] his [redacted] by the application of a cowhide, for the deficiency. [redacted] I [redacted] hear that this castigation produced the desired [redacted]. The money [redacted] liquidating damages [redacted] the assault upon his person.

During [redacted] time, I was quietly occupied [redacted] my counter, selling my pills and periodicals, furnishing my [redacted] a capital cigar, [redacted] refusing offers of the [redacted] advantageous [redacted] assume the management of various theatres; [redacted] my [redacted] Simpson, of Pittsburgh, so [redacted] [redacted] to record it, [redacted] only because my veracity might [redacted] in question, but that every body would [redacted]—what a fool! [redacted] he [redacted] such an offer, he deserves every [redacted] [redacted] upon his head. [redacted] I was determined never again to place my foot upon the stage, while there remained a possibility of obtaining a living by any other method. Day by day, I saw [redacted] amount of my sales decrease, for want of [redacted] to maintain the system of advertising I [redacted] [redacted] menced, and which proved so successful; yet I despaired not, until I found that the profits, so far from supporting my family, were [redacted] small, that we [redacted] eating up the [redacted] belonging to other people. Then I came to a full stop, [redacted] the deficiency was within the power of control.

My old partner, Lewis T. Pratt, now made a proposal to me to unite with him, and make application for the Chestnut Street Theatre, which, after the failing season, under Miss Maywood, was advertised to let. Macready, and other stars of name and [redacted] known to be engaged for [redacted] Theatre, New York, [redacted] with such aid, [redacted] Drury generally [redacted] been [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] the last twenty years—never. We made the application, which [redacted] favourably received; [redacted] before we forwarded the signatures of those gentlemen we had proposed as security for the payment of the rent, Mr. Marshall, of the Walnut Street Theatre, made [redacted] offer, which by [redacted] payment of a few hundred [redacted] in advance, secured the [redacted] [redacted] ended that; but as I never [redacted] [redacted] to be [redacted] in [redacted] project my mind was bent [redacted] [redacted] perseverance could secure the object of my wishes, I at once determined to obtain [redacted] National Olympic; [redacted] turning [redacted] [redacted] my [redacted] the best means of obtaining possession of a theatre, which, as such, [redacted] [redacted] under Burton, Thorne, Amherst, [redacted] Richings, Mr. John H. Oxley presented himself suddenly [redacted] [redacted] ask [redacted] advice upon the subject of [redacted] [redacted] I told him [redacted] had made [redacted] my mind to take [redacted] National. [redacted] proposed joining me in the speculation, and in three days from our first conversation, the lease was signed, and possession obtained. [redacted] [redacted] difficulty was, to obtain a company at so late [redacted] period; in this we succeeded beyond expectations. We had Wemyss, Oxley, Matthews, Shaw, [redacted] Top, Lewis, Winans, Faulkner, Flemming, Becket, Jervis, Collingbourne, F. Myers, Edwards, Colvin, Brown, Bowers, Horn and Neal; Mrs. A. Knight, Madison, Abbott, Cantor; Mimes Thompson, Wheeler, Norman, E. Moore, Downs, Porter and [redacted]—a very good array of [redacted] [redacted] opened on the 23rd September, 1848, with the "Honeymoon," and "Perfection." Receipts 66 dollars; not a very flattering prospect of success. Oxley was anxious to obtain the aid of James Wallack, who had just returned from England. Although I agreed perfectly with him, that the name in our announce bill would add strength, I cautioned him against expecting much in the way of attraction from Mr. Wallack; yet I supposed, after an absence of two years, we might calculate upon engaging him without loss. His first night was only 117 dollars; his whole engagement, second night, 62; third, 79; fourth, 60; fifth, 60; his first benefit 108 1/2 then, 48; 64; 84; 42; 52; his second benefit and last night, 80; whole amount, 677 dollars. Paid Mr. Wallack 278 dollars, for twelve nights. The disastrous commencement, although it disarranged our plans, did not frighten me, knowing that E. Forrest, with whom we ought to have commenced our season, and who was engaged expressly to oppose Macready, at the Chestnut, was to follow. The plan was, not to act on the same night the same play, but to follow each performance; if Macready played "Hamlet" to-night, we acted it the following night, &c. By these means, we succeeded in creating an excitement to witness the different style of two actors, at the head of their profession, in the [redacted] parts. We had the best of the contest, until the petulance of Mr. [redacted] temper upon trifles, induced him to leave hastily for New York, and gave him the appearance of running away from a contest in which he was really the victor. If regret could have availed, he expressed himself freely upon the subject, repenting at leisure the hurried action of a moment. "Ira furor brevis est," [redacted] to be a copy at school for Latin beginners; Mr. Forrest would do well to translate and consider it; it would have saved him [redacted] the very ridiculous position he occupied in the mind of every thinking man, for the petty malevolence which, for injuries, real or supposed, he exhibited in hissing [redacted] Macready, in the Edinburgh Theatre. Let me ask my American [redacted] what would have been the fate of Mr. Macready, if he had dared to hiss Mr. E. Forrest in any theatre in the United States? [redacted] [redacted] turned out, if not otherwise maltreated; certainly never have been allowed to act again in America, notwithstanding the undoubted right he might claim as an auditor to express his [redacted] approbation. Lucky it was for Mr. E. Forrest that John [redacted] rarely troubles himself about these trifling [redacted] The quarrel of two buffoons is of no consequence in Great Britain to any but [redacted]; and he was not even able to make capital out of [redacted] for his native America—which, in charity, I am compelled to suppose, must have been his motive. His own good sense assures him he is wrong, and having failed to produce even a newspaper excitement beyond a passing paragraph, he is ashamed of the littleness of his conduct. What a pity great men should thus expose their weakness.

THEATRICAL BIOGRAPHY.

I copy the following letter [redacted] the New York Spirit of [redacted] Times, of [redacted] of May, [redacted]:

FORREST [redacted]

"Times [redacted] of the London Times.—SIR,—Having seen in your journal of the 12th instant, an article [redacted] 'Jealousy,' a part of which originally appeared in [redacted] published in [redacted] burg, I beg leave, through the medium of your columns, to state that at the time of its publication, I addressed a letter to the Editor of The Scotsman upon the subject, which, as I then was in Dumfries, I sent to a [redacted] in Edinburgh, requesting him to obtain its insertion; but as I was informed The Scotsman refused to receive any communication upon the subject, I need say nothing of the injustice of this refusal. Here then I was disposed to let the matter rest, as upon more mature reflection, I did not deem it worth further attention; but now, as the matter has become a questionable shape by the appearance of the article in your journal, I feel called upon, although reluctantly, to answer it.

"There are two legitimate modes of evincing approbation and disapprobation in the theatre—one expressive of approbation, by [redacted] hands, and the other by hisses to mark dissent; and as well timed and hearty applause, is the just meed of the actor who [redacted] well, so hiss is [redacted]; a salutary and wholesome corrective of the abuses of the [redacted] and it was against one of these abuses that my dissent was expressed, and not, as was stated; 'With a view of expressing his (my) disapproval of the manner in which Mr. Macready gave effect to a particular passage.' The truth is, Mr. Macready thought to introduce a fancy dance into his performance of 'Hamlet,' which I thought, and still think, a desecration of the scene, and at which I evinced that disapprobation, for which the pseudo-critic is pleased to term me an 'insolent,' and this was the only time during the performance [redacted] did so, although the writer evidently seeks, in the article alluded to, to convey a different impression. [redacted] must be observed also, that I was by no means 'solitary' in this expression of opinion.

"That a man may manifest his pleasure or displeasure after the recognised mode, according to the bent of his judgment, actuated by proper motives, and [redacted] justifiable ends, is a right, which, [redacted] now, I have never once [redacted] questioned, and I contend, that right extends equally [redacted] actor, in his capacity as a spectator, as to any other man, besides from the nature of his studies, he is much more competent to judge of a [redacted] performance than any amateur critic, who has never [redacted] [redacted] The writer of the article in The Scotsman, who has most unwarrantably singled me out for public condemnation, has carefully omitted to notice the fact, that I warmly applauded several points of Mr. Macready's performance; and more than once I regretted that the audience did not second me in so doing. As to the petulant charge of professional jealousy preferred against me, I dismiss it with the contempt it merits, confidently relying upon all those of the profession with whom I have been associated, for a ~~rebuttal~~ of this slander."

"Yours, respectfully,

"March, 1838

FORREST."

—Times, 11th of April.

Not ever man occupying the position of Mr. E. Forrest, pen so many lines of bombast and egotism, as are here published. The audience of Edinburgh are fully able to appreciate the talent of Mr. Macready, without taking their eyes from Mr. E. Forrest; nor can his opinion of Macready's acting, alter his position as now one of the first Tragedians belonging to the English stage, any more than could Mr. Macready's opinion of him wrest from Mr. E. Forrest the proud distinction of justly being of being the first Tragedian of the American stage—a title sufficiently honourable to gratify the pride and ambition of any man. Let him gain "bays" in a foreign land, if he can, he will win no prouder station than he holds, among his own countrymen. Mr. E. Forrest is evidently smarting under the blows directed towards him at the Princess' Theatre, on his first appearance there. His vanity forbids him to place these to the account of want of talent in himself, or error in judgment of those who exercised a right (a very doubtful one) so to express their opinion. But Mr. Macready was accused in the newspapers of having paid persons to insult Mr. E. Forrest. Mr. Forrest believes such nonsense, but appears to have been over-anxious to repay Macready a supposed insult of this kind. As a stage director few possess the tact and judgment of Macready; and if he introduces a fancy dance in "Hamlet," (in what manner are left in the dark,) his judgment no doubt could give a reason for the introduction. If it was on the stage where the tragedy is enacted before the Court of Denmark, I can, as a stage manager, see no objection to such a dance, as the prelude to the performance which follows, rather tending to remove suspicion of the trap he (Hamlet) has designed to "catch the conscience of the king." It is as it may, Mr. Forrest, but the actor, was wrong in the manner to express an opinion. He is too old an artist not to have witnessed more than an auditor or several auditors, turned out by the mandate of the pit for interrupting the performance, by the annoyance of the majority assembled to witness a play, although they were only exercising a right, "which until now, he has never been heard questioned." Why, in the Strand Theatre, in 1836, during the performance of Kean in "Othello"—"Mr. Wood [ ] the audience he [ ] despatched [ ] expel such as disturbed the audience, and that they should [ ] prosecuted to the utmost rigour of the law. The officers [ ] their duty, and the play [ ] off without the slightest noise. It is generally believed that the disturbance was occasioned by some apprentice boys, who [ ] [ ] express that dislike to Mr. Kean, their employer [ ] fearful of exhibiting himself."—London States Gazette.

If this proceeding was correct, what becomes of the right [ ] Miss?

I think [ ] was pretty strongly questioned, although I agree [ ] [ ] E. Forrest, that it is the best corrective of the abuses of [ ] stage, and judiciously exercised, of service to the [ ]. It [ ] the only censure he dreads, and is most sensitive upon; but should [ ] be exercised by [ ] actor towards another.

"We have [ ] the following note from [ ] fellow-citizen, Mr. Hackett," says [ ] Courier and Enquirer of May 9th, 1846, "to which we give place with pleasure—

"To [ ] [ ] THE COLLECTOR AND [ ]—Will you afford [ ] [ ] of replying [ ] various inquirers, who are desirous to [ ] [ ] of my [ ] [ ] of Shakespeare's ' [ ] [ ] my authority [ ] Mr. Macready's having [ ] [ ] a 'fancy [ ] before the play-scene in that tragedy.

—INQUIRY.—I presume curiosity upon [ ] subject to have [ ] [ ] republication [ ] of [ ] following paragraph [ ] a [ ] [ ]:—

"[ ] MACREADY [ ] MR. FORREST:—Mr. [ ] Forrest, [ ] [ ] Tragedian, has written to [ ] London Times, justifying [ ] [ ] in hissing [ ] Macready during his performance [ ] 'Hamlet,' at the Edinburgh Theatre. He states, he frequently applauded parts of which he approved, and had an equal right to hiss at passages [ ] [ ] thought erroneous. The truth is, says Forrest, [ ] Macready thought fit to introduce a fancy [ ] into his performance of 'Hamlet,' [ ] I thought, and still think, a desecration of the scene."

"I will venture to explain, what I suppose, Forrest meant by a "fancy dance."

"Hamlet, after his instructions to the players, and his confidential [ ] [ ] to his friend, Horatio, just before the play-scene [ ] [ ] observes to him—'They are coming to the play—I must be idle—get you a place.' Consequently, I have always understood [ ] to [ ] the word idle, in this situation, that he must seem to have no fixed [ ] or industrious object, during the performance of the play about to be represented, policy dictating the expediency of his appearing listless and unoccupied, in order that his guilty uncle, the king, might disregard [ ] presence, attend closely to the play, and become entrapped into some exhibitions of exasperation and rage."

"Mr. Macready, however, when I saw him act 'Hamlet' at the Park Theatre, in 1845, appeared to construe the word idly very differently; for the reason that he immediately assumed the manner of a silly youth, tossed his head right and left, and skipped back and forth, across the stage, five or six times before the spotlights, at the same time switching his handkerchief, held by a corner over his right and left shoulder alternately; indeed, making gyrations not unlike those fire-ribbons, which I have seen idle and thoughtless urchins cut in the air, with a stick burnt to a live coal at one end, until the whole court have had sufficient time to parade, before he seated, until Hamlet finds himself addressed by the king, who enquires after his health.

"I therefore submit whether this manner of Mr. Macready's rendering the scenes upon the stage, is not what was only comparatively new to us 'a fancy dance,' by Mr. Forrest, being elsewhere, also, à la pas de menuet.' At all events, I beg to state, that in no edition of Shakespeare which I own, or have ever seen, is there any pretext for the introduction of a dance before the play-scene, or upon the stage erected for the performance before the king and court of Denmark.

"The public's obedient servant,

"Jas. H. [redacted]"

"[redacted] April 29th, 1851"

"[redacted] Hackett 'sole judge and umpire' of another's thoughts? He has no pretension to be admitted as a tragedian. His attempt to act a few characters written by Shakespeare, always give rise to a sneer and a smile by the actors; while contempt would be a better word to express the feelings of the audience, who are rarely [redacted] upon such occasions. In his own sphere, Hackett is an actor above mediocrity; but as a tragedian—good luck! good luck!—yet he writes as if he would any with the immortal bard—

"——— I am Sir Othello,
When I see my Nye, led no dog back."

He knows enough of the business of the stage, to know that two actors rarely play the same part in exactly the same way—surely, nobody will think of hiring Mr. Charles Kean for the great improvement he has presented to the public, in the display introduced into the tragedy of "Richard the Third;" yet Mr. Hackett will look in vain at two old editions of Shakespeare, or his twenty-two modern ones, if he possesses them, for the authority for such melo-dramatic display. Every actor, occupying the high station claimed by Mr. Forrest or Mr. Macready, has always been allowed to regulate the stage business of those scenes in which they are engaged; and unless, all around is progressing, we are prepared to see stage stand still, every effort of a master mind, although it may not be successful, is worthy of a fair trial, and should be protected from all assaults from the profession, jealous as they always have been of the success each obtains over the other. Forrest calculation no Durol was, that, as in America, at Boston and Baltimore, they drove Keen from their stage, for an impertinence they would not brook, so the Edinburgh people would chastise Keen insolence as a foreign Keen. If they had driven him from the stage in Great Britain, the excitement and sympathy of the citizens of the United States would have secured such a succession of triumphant engagements in the theatres in America, as never could be dreamed of by an actor, and he would have closed his professional career, (if such really be his purpose, as he stated in Dublin,) in a perfect blaze of glory.

Keen me now leave England, and return to Keen Theatre in Philadelphia where after Forrest's departure, the "Mysteries of Paris," Keen by John Beeton, Keen C. Wemyss, and James Gann, was placed upon the stage with a celebrity which astonished every body. "The King of the Mist," scenery by Keen Smith, kept up the attraction, until, on the 28th of December, we had recovered lost ground, and appeared to have the tide of success fall in our favour, with Keen, the Ellalar Brothers, Keen Virginia Minstrels, Keen Booth offered to play, but Keen I was afraid of him; he had been playing his usual antics in Boston and New York. I was decidedly opposed to making an attempt, which, if followed by a failure, would have again ruined all chance of the success which now seemed within our grasp; unfortunately, Mr. Oxley yielded to my opinion. Had I permitted him on this occasion to exercise his own judgment, Booth's triumphant engagement at the Walnut Street, which turned the tide of popular favour back to that theatre, would have been ours. Never did Booth act better, behave more steadily, or draw more money than during this engagement in Philadelphia, (which I had thrown away). A singular piece, under the title of "Blud-a-Nonne," in which the actors were all frogs, possessing much merit, was produced, from the pen of Dunn English. Several scenes were much applauded; but it was too long, and became tiresome--the curtain fell, not to rounds Keen applause, but to a shower of groans and hisses. "Oscola," a play by Col. Sherborne, "Handy Andy," "The Enchanted Lake," "Yara," "Linda," "The Imp," "Rockwood," "Mansel," "Robert Emmet," "Tom and Jerry in Philadelphia," and another drama by Dunn English, entitled the "Doom of the Drinker," failed to produce money. Our hard fought and dearly gained battle, was snatched from our grasp in the very hour of victory and triumph, by one false move. We closed on the 27th of April, after a season of 185 nights, which the seasons, Welch and Mann, were the only parties any Oxley retired from the management, and I made preparations to re-open on the 11th of May. I sent Landers from New York, and with the aid John Wiser, artist, produced "Fortunio" in a style which, under other circumstances, would have succeeded. The riots in May, 1844, when bloodshed and destruction throughout certain portions of the districts, placed the city under martial law. The proclamation to that effect, was issued on the very day I purposed opening—the consequence—nobody could attend the theatre for thirteen nights. I struggled on, to close without a hope of future effort. The theatre surrendered to General Walsh, who determined to establish an amphitheatre upon the scale of Astley's in London. He has succeeded, and with the enterprise and capital promised, will succeed. Walsh's amphitheatre in the city of Philadelphia, is destined to become a conspicuous place of public amusement, whose influence will be sound through the city in the Union.

CHAPTER XLII.

Chesnut and Walnut Street Theatres. Mrs. Cushman Designs. J. M. Field. G. Vandenhoeck Wallack. Maternity. Burton opens the Arch Street. Mr. Anderson. Pratt and Wemyss again together. The "Monks of Monk Hall." Fear of a Row. Mr. Crisp. Mrs. Mowatt. The Ethiopian Opera Company. Mr. Fry's Opera of "Leonora." Conclusion. Plato Corcoran Opera.

THE Chesnut and Walnut Street Theatres being more united under the same management, Marshall opened Old Drury on 7th of September; W. B. Hays announced as exclusive stage manager; C. Cushman acting manager—thus giving the lady an opportunity of resigning her dignity without wounding her professional reputation. "Man and Wife," and a "Lover by Proxy," in which J. M. Field, an actor whose reputation depends upon the skill with which he reads a newspaper—(belonging to the corps editorial, must support him)—than dramatic actor or genius, played Charles Austencourt and Harry Lawless. He appeared among us, and departed again without an enquiry made. On the 14th of September, the Walnut opened with "Laugh when you Can," and "Woman's Life"—here the error committed by Maywood & Co., of charging seventy-five cents and fifty cents at the Chesnut Street Theatre, to see the same company who, in removing from the corner of Ninth and Walnut Street, were only worth fifty cents for the boxes and twenty-five cents for the pit, was committed. G. [redacted] was the only star. The Chestnut Street was occupied by the French Opera company [redacted] the 23rd of October, when Macready opened as Macbeth. On the 13th of November, [redacted] Italian Company, under Vattellini, played Bellini's "Norma" in [redacted] original language: produced "Bellicario," "Il Puritani," "Lucia di Lammermoor," and "Gemma di Verov." Wallack played on the 29th of November, followed by Hackett [redacted] the 7th of December. One Bull astonished the audience by [redacted] wonderful execution of his show. On the 18th, Macready returned, playing "The Bridal," and the theatre [redacted] for [redacted] season on the 26th; minus, how many dollars, [redacted] [redacted] This [redacted] the first taste you have had of the bitterness of [redacted] ment; your actors unpaid; your credit [redacted] of [redacted] for the first [redacted] sullied; your legitimate sphere of action, the [redacted] Theatre, occupied by Howe as a circus; and the folly demonstrated of one [redacted] attempting to conduct two theatre [redacted] the [redacted] city at [redacted] time.

Mr. Burton, not contented with the [redacted] which crowned his efforts as an actor everywhere, again grasps the truncheon which had fallen from the hands of Rowell and Deverna, assumes the management [redacted] the Arch Street Theatre. [redacted] 3d of June, 1844. Chance threw into his hands some excellent actors: George Barrett, [redacted] and wife, and others returning from the south and west, enabled him, after the [redacted] week [redacted] two, to carry on a war with [redacted] prospect of [redacted] and where success attends him, he [redacted] always indefatigable in [redacted] exertions. Finally, he obtains the [redacted] Mr. Lovatt, and opens for the fall season, on [redacted] 9th September, with Mr. Macready as Hamlet: E. Forrest playing on [redacted] night, at the Walnut Street, whose [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] Saturday, the 7th, as Damon, determined to have [redacted] night to [redacted] before commencing the [redacted] a second time, in [redacted] he was [redacted] successful before—the chance [redacted] fled. Macready, [redacted] the Arch Street Theatre too, [redacted] the best of the battle, it being announced as his farewell engagement in [redacted] Philadelphia. Throughout his [redacted] of the United [redacted] [redacted] encountered M. E. Forrest, either [redacted] the [redacted] night, or immediately preceding him, [redacted] announced in [redacted] bills to [redacted] him. [redacted] Macready uttered no complaints upon this determined dogging of his track, which proved detrimental to [redacted] purse, [redacted] not [redacted] reputation. Then why [redacted] [redacted] E. Forrest [redacted] friends charge Mr. [redacted] with unfairness of conduct to him, in England? I do not [redacted] [redacted] Macready [redacted] [redacted] of Mr. E. Forrest, in London, [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] instant, although the course of conduct [redacted] [redacted] pursued towards him, in the [redacted] States, might lead

Potter to expect some retaliation, where the tables were changed, and the American tragedian was the foreign artist.

■ season 1842-44, was noted for ■ ■ ■ of ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ America, Ole Bull, Vieux Tampa, Wallace, Nagel, &c., &c. Ole Bull was the only ■ ■ ■ one; wherever he played, the enthusiasm of the dilettanti filled his pockets, while the Concerts of all the other were but thinly attended.

MR. ANDERSON,

A young man unknown to fame, of the Macready school, without servile imitation, appeared as Hamlet, in the Arch Street Theatre: his engagement was not profitable to Manager Burton, who terminated it rather abruptly, to produce "Putnam;" but on a second visit to the Chestnut Street Theatre, under Pratt and Wemyss, and a third one with Burton, his talent had been more justly appreciated. The attempt made to him off the stage, in retaliation for Forrest's reception in London, was frowned down; and what might have proved an unpleasant termination to his career in Philadelphia, became the means of fixing him firmly in the estimation of the play going public. His greatest merit as an actor is the earnest manner with which he enters heart and soul into the assumption of character, and never flags from the commencement to the termination—thus carrying his audience, once enlisted in his favour, with irresistible force along with him. There is something too much of vehemence in his Claude Melnotte; and it is only the earnest manner in which he performs his task that covers the glaring absurdity of the termination to the fourth act. His impersonation of the Stranger is the best I can call to recollection, since Edmund Kean, who was in this character unapproached by any artist of his day. Mr. Anderson's future career in the United States will be similar to that of Mr. James Wallack at the same age—triumph upon triumph awaits him—his reward, a fortune in a brief space. But, to return to his first engagement, by which, having reaped neither fame or money, he was so loud in his denunciation of ■ ■ ■ treatment, as to publicly ■ ■ ■ dare nothing could induce him to act in any theatre over ■ ■ ■ Burton had the slightest control. Burton's good luck overcame this obstacle, when Anderson was a card worth contending for. Mr. Rodney engaged him to act at the Holiday Street Theatre in Baltimore, but could procure no actors; his first two nights gave promise of such a brilliant engagement, that when Rodney was unable to keep his theatre open, he was ■ ■ ■ to bury the hatchet, and act with Burton, at ■ ■ ■ Theatre, where, once reconciled, he ■ ■ ■ him to return to the Arch Street Theatre, very much to our regret. There is now a strong desire to see him again; and his next engagement in the Quaker City will be a great one. He may—the Arch, the Chestnut, or the Walnut.

My partner, Pratt, having obtained the lease of the Chestnut Theatre, after delays which rendered all hopeless, made a proposition to try our forces once together—and on the — day of October we opened with "Simpson and Co." "Love in Humble Life," and "The Blue Domino." John Sefton, stage manager; the company—W. Chapman, Jas. Mason, Charles Howard, Wemyss, C. Smith, Jordan, Byrne, Moron, Forrest, Stafford, Dawes, Matthews, Brunton, Anderson, O'Brien, Kemble, Solomon, Sullivan; Miss H. Matthews, Mrs. A. Knight, Mrs. Jordan, Mrs. Kemble, Mrs. Smith, M'Bride, Mrs. Forrest, Hantonville, Wagstaff, Archer, Sinclair, the dancer Gertrude, and In the commencement we were to disappointment; Nelson, who engaged to open the theatre, did not arrive; Saturday night was lost, and the bill announced for Monday, we determined, Nelson or no Miss Nelson, to commence the season; was changed "La Sylphide" to the three farces named; on Wednesday, when the lady appeared, played to a beggarly account of empty boxes—yet insisted on playing six nights, which yielded him nothing and kept people out of the theatre. Jim Crow Rice the next and the admirable manner he acted the burlesque of "Othello," his engagement profitable himself, of course acceptable to the managers. Our engagement was not so successful; but thus far, despite of all opposition, we were successful in the main point—that is, in paying the actors regularly. A Mr. Lippard was publishing a book entitled "The Moths of Monk Hall," in which he exposed, right and left, the prodigality both of the rich and powerful, and the poor and worthless of the city of Philadelphia. By the advice of my worthy friend, Ashbell Green, at that time one of the Deputy Attorney Generals, I procured an interview, and he drew up a contract, for which, under considerations, Mr. Lippard agreed to dramatise his own work for the Chestnut Street Theatre, and to furnish me with a copy of the play in fourteen days from the date of our agreement. The scenery was painted, the properties arranged, and the piece announced for representation. No one had been placarded, than young Mercer, and acquitted murder of Peaberton, assaulted the bill-poster, some one having told him that he figured conspicuously in Judge

Conrad, my old and good friend, came up to my house in a state of great excitement, to say that somebody had told him he figured in the play. I told him that he ought to know me better than to suppose I would tolerate such a thing against a friend, and handed him the sheet to which he alluded, his name having been struck out by my own hand from the play. This completely satisfied him, and he departed with his good opinion of me, I am sure, not lessened by our interview. Down I went to the theatre—here there was excitement upon excitement—everybody was of belief that I should be a fling at them—some laughed—others swore—while some threatened,—and Mr. Singleton Mercer actually applied for two hundred pit tickets, to give away, for the purpose of a grand row, which my treasurer was fool enough to sell him: he afterwards purchased twenty-five / and when the play was over, I actually had the impudence to request the return of this money. My friend Green, now with me, looked over the play, and on Saturday night gave me his opinion that there was nothing that could reasonably be objected to in it—he and those connected with the theatre alone had only seen the manuscript. Threats of tearing down the theatre, sacking it, &c., were now openly heard; and to all applications my answer was—this play will certainly be acted on Monday night. So closed the Saturday performance; at least an assurance to the manager of a full house on Monday, let the result be what it might. The play bills, on Sunday, were the magnets of universal attraction; wherever one was posted, there was a crowd perusing it. At two o'clock, I received a note from Mr. McCall, the mayor of the city, desiring to see me at his house, at four o'clock, upon a subject that would not brook delay. I presumed it was the "Monks of Monk Hall," and repaired with a play bill, at the time named. His honour met me with bland courtesy, and informed me that my play was dangerous—directed me to see Mr. Green, (deputy attorney-general,) with whom he had a conversation on the subject, and to see him again at his office at nine o'clock on Monday morning. Away I hied to my friend Green. "What could we do? We laughed. "Well," said he "this is a pretty affair—I approved your suggestion—I advised you to try this affair; and now as a public officer, I may be called upon to try you for acting it. I tell you there is no preventing you doing so; but I would rather that you should consult your friend, Constant Guillon; his head is cooler upon this subject than mine, and you know you can rely upon the advice he will give you being both sound and legal, and, I am sure, guided by good feeling for your welfare. Do nothing in this business rashly: I will meet you at the mayor's office on Monday morning." My friend Guillon had caught the excitement, said he had been to my friend A. Godey, to request he would see me upon the subject—the excitement increasing every hour. Godey would not advise me one way nor the other, after hearing my story, but left the matter to a night's reflection and the interview with the mayor in the morning.

I met the mayor, according to appointment, and offered him the play to read; this he declined. I then proposed that he should walk up to the theatre and see the rehearsal, that he might judge whether there was any thing objectionable; this too was declined. He said he did not doubt that every thing was as I had represented it; but that we had just escaped from riot and bloodshed—were in the height of a popular election—the blood of all parties warm—(the news was just coming in of the defeat of the whigs in New York, on the other side of Cayuga Bridge, in the presidential election)—that he appealed to me as a good citizen and the father of a family, not to commit an act which might cause me regret during my natural life, should riot and bloodshed flow from it—that if I persisted, he could afford me no protection from the police of the city. My partner, Mr. Pratt, being out of town, I told him, in such a case, I was unwilling to take the responsibility of withdrawing the play, upon my own shoulders—that in all probability Mr. Pratt would arrive in the city by two o'clock—to let matters rest as they were until then, and I would see him again. In the meantime, the rehearsal went on—message upon message, threat upon threat, was communicated to me upon the stage. At twelve o'clock, a note came from Mr. Evans, the president of the board of directors, advising the withdrawal of the play. My friend Guellou's opinion was, I had an undoubted right to act it; but were he in my place, he would not, under the circumstances, run the risk. This opinion (as his opinions always have weight with me) did more towards the final determination than all the rest. Indeed, to Mr. Guellou belongs the credit, if any be due, of having prevented the performance; he knows I always follow his advice when asked; and I did not dare to let my own opinion weigh as a straw in the balance, after his decision both as a lawyer and a friend. At one o'clock, General Cadwallader, one of the board of agents, who had been sent for by the mayor, made his appearance at the theatre, to request the play might not be acted. In half an hour afterwards, I received the following letter from his honour the mayor:—

(COPY.)

"Mayor's Office, November 11th, 1844.

"Messrs. WHEAT AND PRATT—

"Gentlemen, as mayor of the city, I have to request that the exhibition of the piece called the 'Quaker City,' advertised for this evening, at the may not take place, for, as I have verbally communicated to Mr. Wemyss.

"Respectfully your
"F. M'CALL."

"NOTICE.—In obedience to the request, the public respectfully informed that the performance will not take place. The entertainment for the evening will be 'Grandfather Whitehead,' the 'President Ince,' and 'He is not a Man.'"
"PRATT AND WENTON."

Chestnut Street Theatre, Nov. 11, 1855.

I once more repaired to his office. I proposed to him that the curtain should rise, and the performance be suffered to proceed, scene by scene; that on the slightest opposition being manifested by the audience to stop the play, the curtain should instantly fall, and some other piece be substituted.— He replied, that would be just as had he acting the whole play; mischief, if any was really intended, would by him be fully accomplished. He stated, that, among men; Mercer, had purchased tickets, he was informed, for the avowed purpose of putting down the play. "Then," said I, "why not arrest him, and bind him over to keep the peace?" "Because," Wemyss, I really think you have struck the first blow to your play-bill." Ere we parted, I yielded the point, and consented to the play, as he wished, that he would give a statement to the public, clearing the theatre from all blame. He substituted "The Monks of Hall;" the difficulty was to prevent a row, because the piece was performed. An immense populace filled the square from Sixth to Chestnut Street; all the police of the city could scarcely keep order. The play, on the boards, in front of the building, had been torn before any like quiet was obtained; the doors of the theatre were closed by nine o'clock, and the crowd gradually dispersed.

My opinion has never been changed upon this subject. If the play been acted, no row, or at least no more than usual, place when any favourite actor disappoints an audience, would have occurred. The play was really a good one; once heard, it would have secured a run. Had its satire been aimed at the low and vulgar, it would not have been assailed; but it struck at judges, members of Congress, editors, as well as thieves and murderers. I saw a mass of filth and obscenity played at the Chatham Garden as the prohibited play; I could not recognise a line. It is sufficient to say, my play was in five acts, this in two; that is proof enough they were not the same, although Mr. Lippard furnished the MS. portion of it. He so far forgot himself as to assault Mr. Asbell Green, the only real friend he had in the whole transaction, as the author of the suppression : no opinion was ever more falsely adopted.

Having complied with the request of the city authorities at a sacrifice of pecuniary interest, at least the managers should have been protected from the slims and filth of the press, which, from Maine to Florida, harped upon the fiddle string offered to them by the Spirit of the Times in Philadelphia, of obscenity. The mayor never read nor saw the play ; no such reason was ever given for the request to withdraw it. I yielded a point of right to a request from the authorities of the city, and what was my recompense !—abuse.

I have laid the whole of this affair before my readers, yet newspaper after newspaper reiterated the libellous falsehoods, and, in future ages, as reference will be received, as truth of holy writ, in deep damnation of the managers of the Chestnut Street Theatre, who deserved the thanks of the whole community. That Mr. McCall did not, under his signature, as Mayor of the city of Philadelphia, protect us from this injustice, I have ever felt the hardest part of this altogether hard business. The idea of prohibiting a play, without even reading it, is new indeed ! The most intolerant censor of the public press reads an article before condemnation.

The effect of this upon the interest of the theatre, was a loss of seven hundred dollars in two weeks, for until Mr. Anderson appeared, no one visited the theatre at all. We owed the actors one week's salary, and this they made a plea not only for neglect of duty, but to leave the theatre when they pleased, and how they pleased. To Mr. Anderson an apology was due ; it was not until his two last nights that he found we had really a good company, when they chose to work. As the attraction of the evening, on the 22nd of December, we produced the "Bohemian Girl," with Mr. Fraser, Mr. and Mrs. Seguin, Monsieur Martin, and Julia Turnbull. Marshall produced a melo-drama of the same name at the Walnut, concocted by Burton and Foster ; he went still further : he impudently announced Balfe's opera, with scarcely a note of the music. These were good advertisements for our theatre, and the "Bohemian Girl" was played thirteen nights out of an engagement of eighteen, and afterwards revived in the spring. The bitter hostility of the Spirit of the Times, and the succession of libels, day after day, which appeared in columns against the Chestnut Street Theatre, induced me and Wemyss to prosecute for libel,—the first in my theatrical career I ever troubled myself to notice legally the slang of a newspaper. Mr. Hill followed the opera, but with no attraction. In order to induce the fashionable circles to continue their visits, we made an arrangement to produce the comedy of "Old Heads and Young Hearts" with the Park company of New York. Mr. Chippendale, Mr. John Fisher, Mr. John Povey, Mr. Dyott, Mr. Crocker, Mr. Gallott, Miss Clara Ellis, Mrs. Henry Knight, [redacted] Duval, [redacted] Dyott, and Mr. Lewis, the prompter, were added to our own company, and it will be scarcely believed, they could [redacted] play [redacted] average of a hundred dollars per night, benefit [redacted] It therefore became obvious, that the best plan would be to close the doors first trying Mrs. Shaw, and a portion of the Bowery company: Mr. Clarke, [redacted] Milnor, [redacted] Dyott, Mr. John Fisher, and [redacted] Crocker,—all would [redacted] do; [redacted] the Chestnut Street closed its doors, minus two thousand dollars. The Park company, united with the Chestnut Street, were worth [redacted] dollars per night; but the Bowery, [redacted] Park, [redacted] Chestnut Street—all these, [redacted] the [redacted] of [redacted] Shaw, [redacted] [redacted] of the American stage, were worth only fifty dollars per night; the stockholders, as usual, loud in their denunciation of the management, and Dr. Lehman complaining that they had no amusement.

Young Murphy, who had been my call-boy, and who commenced his theatrical career with me, called to know if I would make an arrangement with Palmer's Ethiopian Opera Company. We proposed terms, which they accepted, and commenced with "Le Bonnam-bu-ela," to $26 dollars. This success continued for a month, the only profitable one during the management of Pratt and Wemyss: so that negro-singing and dancing, after all, is the amusement best suited to the audience of the Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia. While we were making arrangements to produce a piece called the "Fall of Kischack," by General Harlan, the [redacted] [redacted] burning of the Bowery Theatre, on the night of the 18th of April, reached us. I at once [redacted] to place the [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] disposal of Hamblin, if nothing [redacted] offered. Mr. Jackson, whose individual enterprise has erected the present Bowery Theatre, and brought successfully to [redacted] present condition, answered this letter, declining [redacted] the [redacted] sent. [redacted] Hamblin [redacted] proposals for a large Theatre [redacted] Broadway, but failed in bringing his project to bear. [redacted] last misfortune seemed [redacted] have paralyzed all [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] resigned to younger [redacted] the task of future toil. [redacted] Mr. [redacted] [redacted] proved [redacted] worthy to succeed [redacted], his spirited career bears witness, in the face of all difficulties: [redacted] placed [redacted] new Theatre, which he opened [redacted] of August, 1845, [redacted] firmly in [redacted] affections of [redacted] audience, as it ever was [redacted] its palmiest days. Long [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] enjoy his good fortune.

On the 4th of June, 1845, an opera, by Mr. Fry, was placed before the public, in a style of which Messrs. Pratt and Wemys have reason to be proud: every scene, every dress, every property, was perfect; sixty choristers, and forty musicians; principal characters supported by Mr Fraser, and Mr Seguin, Mr. Reehings, Mrs. Breenston, and Mrs Ince; the subject of the libretto, the "Lady of Lyons," the title of the opera, "Leonora." A great deal has been written and said about plagiarism, and want of originality of thought and execution: I appeal to any musician, whether such an opera be not a creditable performance to a composer.

Fry selected New York, instead of Philadelphia, as his field for his operations, and whole United States would have greeted the eye of the composer from all quarters. The sin he committed was daring to present such a lyrical drama composed in America to the citizens of Philadelphia in judgment, before the New Yorkers had an opportunity of passing upon its merits. Should it be played with success in Europe, how altered will be public opinion in its favour here! Fry may plume upon it as a work of art, to be proudly cherished. I know no greater gratification, as a manager, than having been the means of placing it before his countrymen. It was acted sixteen nights, although the expense attending a production, rendered it unproductive both to the author and the managers, the Seguins reaped both money and fame.

Of Mrs. Seguin's performance of Leonora, I can only say it is the most perfect thing I have seen, since Miss M. Tree's Zaidé, in Coleman's play of the "Lion of Javan," and I hardly magnify such unqualified praise. On the last night, she was presented with a silver pitcher, bearing a well deserved inscription—a well deserved compliment; a one should have been made to Mr Chubb, the conductor of the orchestra of the Park Theatre, to whose much due.

The theatre closed on the 1st of July, and was to open again, under Pratt and Wemys. Our application for a renewal of the lease received an answer from the gentlemen, Mr Evans, Gen. Cadwallader, Dr. Lehman, and Mr. Phillips. We went out, and Burton walked in, but at this moment we have not been informed by the gentlemen of the board, whether Mr Burton was or was not their tenant.

Gentlemen are not bound by the common courtesies of life in their dealings with rascals and play actors—why should they be? They don't object to receive the player's money—all his fortunes, by way of dividend, and him in all respects as an outcast from society. Neither Mr. nor myself would have occupied the theatre at all, had we not expected the lease to have been renewed for the following year. It was a hopeless attempt for 1844-45, which we trusted 1845-46 would enable us to work upon. The stockholders had ample security for their rent, which, having received from our friends, justice to them, if not to us, required, at least, an answer to an application, and I may be permitted to add, the renewal at least for another year.

The Chestnut Street Theatre now changes hands every season. Better convert it, gentlemen, into stores, or into an hotel, it will pay you better; while it stands, it will always be the theatre for foreign artists, without whose aid its doors must remain, as at present, closed. Barton says he lost there all he made by the Arch Street Theatre, and abandoned it at the end of the season. Marshall burnt his fingers with it. It might be made to pay as an Opera House, open, only for that purpose, a few weeks at a time; but as a regular Temple of the Drama, its fate is sealed for ever.

The last act of kindness I received at the hands of my Philadelphia friends was a complimentary benefit on the 19th of March, the proceeds of which were most serviceable. To that public to whom I am indebted for many acts of kindness, the last by no means the least,) which I still hope to enjoy, I submit the foregoing pages, and if a single individual has derived an hour's amusement from their perusal, I am repaid for the length of my task, and have but to add with pleasure,

Fine's Oronot Opus.

H. L. McLane, Printer, Glasgow

